DIET AND HEALTH

by them—air, water and food—is measured accurately, and likewise everything that is excreted by them. It has been proven that food utilized in the body has practically the same energy as when burned in a calorimeter, and the tables that are given by those experts allow for the differences in digestion.

It is not difficult to count calories. You can count them only approximately anyway. You have to count 'em for the rest of your life, if you are inclined to be overweight, so you had better get a good text book on the subject. All book stores and libraries have textbooks on Diet and these books contain lists of 100 calorie portions of food. (There is one called Diet and Health that I'm partial to.). I will give you lists every once in a while in the column.

What you particularly want to remember is the calorie value of the foods you like best. They are undoubtedly very high in calories! Remember that a slice of bread, one-half inch thick, butter or any oil, one level tablespoonful, three cubes of sugar, a medium chocolate cream, one medium potato, one tablespoonful of ice cream, two ounces of lean meat, one to two tablespoonsfuls of rich gravies, are 100 calories each. And a piece of pie, depending upon its richness, is from 250 to 350 or more. If you will remember these figures you will undoubtedly not eat three or four slices of bread at a meal and end up with a rich dessert for you will realize that you probably are eating in one meal enough for your needs for the day, and your other two meals are going to be stored away as fat.

COLDS THAT DEVELOP INTO PNEUMONIA

Persistent coughs and colds lead to serious trouble. You can stop them now with Creomulsion, an emulsified creosote that is pleasant to take. Creomulsion is a new medical discovery with two-fold action; it soothes and heals the inflamed membranes and inhibits germ growth.

Of all known drugs, creosote is recognized by high medical authorities as one of the greatest healing agencies for persistent coughs and colds and other forms of throat troubles. Creomulsion contains, in addition to creosote, other healing elements which soothe and heal the infected membranes and stop the irritation and inflammation, while the creosote goes on to the stomach, is absorbed into the blood, attacks the seat of the trouble and checks the growth of the germs.

Creomulsion is guaranteed satisfactory in the treatment of persistent coughs and colds, bronchial asthma, bronchitis and other forms of respiratory diseases, and is excellent for building up the system after colds or flu. Money refunded if any cough or cold is not relieved after taking according to directions. Ask your druggist. Creomulsion Company, Atlanta, Ga. (adv.)

"SANDY"

By ELENORE MEHERIN

THE STORY SO FAR.

Sandy McNeil is forced by her parents into a loveless marriage to Ben Murillo, a rich Italian. Following the ceremony in her Spanish ancestral home in Santa Barbara, she flees into the garden for a final secret meeting with Timmy, a childhood sweetheart. Judith Moore, her cousin — San Francisco stenographer, in love with Douglas Keith, a student, finds her and warns her of a search being made by her parents. Sandy tells Judith she cannot go with Murillo, but she does accompany him to their honeymoon retreat. Later at Lake Tahoe they clash over Murillo's refusal to accompany her to a hotel dinner dance, locking in her in their rooms. Murillo criticizes her conduct in the hotel as unladylike and angry words on both sides follow.

GO ON WITH THE STORY

CHAPTER 10

She wondered how other women endured a loveless marriage how they let men kiss them when they were sick with recoil; going on with it through long, sodden years.

Was it because things inside of them really died? They became dulled even to resentment?

Then all she had to hope from the future was the time when she would be deadened — when she would became an automaton? You sometimes see women like this. They have an ironed out look. Once in a while they laugh; they seem so startled as though the sound from their own lips is an impertinence; an almost forgotten thing.

She would become one of them? Sandy glanced at her hand resting on the arm of the chair — her soft, delicate hand. The moonlight touched it, made the skin luminous. She thrust it behind her—shut her eyes quickly. She wouldn't face these thoughts.

She wished to hush the merciless questions. Why had her parents wanted this marriage? She didn't care about money. Oh, she loved nice things, of course. But they'd never been rich. She had to save every nickel when she wanted a trip to the city. Even saving, she usually had to wait till some friend was driving up and would take her along. But she made an adventure of it. She'd been as happy as could be. Why had they craved wealth for her — "Railroaded" her into it? That's what Bob McNeil said.

But how had she herself been so appallingly stupid? She had imagined Ben Murillo would graciously remain a courier after the marriage. He would transact the whole matter of their relationship in her hand. She said several things sounding him out on this. He smiled—told her it would be the one wish of his life to make her happy. So he would go on being a charming distant lover until such a time as it pleased her to accept him as a husband!

She fancied this! And she was Sandy McNeil — up-to-the-minute hard-boiled. She was 'that wild Sandy McNeil'—wise as Sin!

Yet Judith, whom everyone thought plain and odd and so quiet—Judith knew. Judith shuddered that anyone would dream of marrying without love; love so complete that you ached with it; you longed for the man to stoop down quickly and kiss you. At the touch of his lips, Judith once said, she expected reality, all sense of time, space, hands, eyes to vanish. She and the man she loved would be swept together in a flood of music and song. Emotion, beautiful and supreme.

They had cheated her out of this—oh, they had! That's what her uncle meant that day he talked in the living room to her father and said the marriage would be death for a girl like Sandy.

It was inconceivable to her now that she hadn't realized this —that she had listened for a single moment to her mother and sisters. They said Judith's kind of love was a thing of the imagination. Marriage was the same after the first few months, except that with a rich man you still had the money; with a poor man you had only the drudgery.

In these two months of her marriage, she'd had all that money could buy. She'd gone from one end of the state to the other, stopping at all the fine hotels she'd read about. Murillo had been generous—glad to see her delight. He'd been proud of the little stir she'd sometimes caused. He would lean over the table and whisper "MY WIFE!" as though he had created her.

But he had watched her like a hawk. She had endured it thinking: "Oh, that's just his foreign way." There were several little incidents that she recalled now with a sobbing indignation. There was that time at Yosemite when she had been wild to go on the trail to Glacier. Murillo disliked strenuous exercise. Though he was little past 30, he had an antipathy for all physical exertion. He smiled in amusement when Sandy pressed him to come along.

So finally she said: "Oh, don't Benny Venuto; just drape yourself on the couch. You ought to get a job posing as an ad for a perpetual siesta. So take your little nap. You won't mind if I go?"

He became immediately excited —the narrowing of his eyes as they did this evening—little stilettos. He said to her coolly: "Have you lacked for pleasure, Sandy? I think you've had plenty crammed into these few days, haven't you?

"I should think it would be more becoming to take your pleasure with your husband."

Another evening she was talking with some tourists from New York. They were Dr. Jameson and his wife. They'd taken a great liking to Sandy. The doctor was about 40—a cultured, princely fellow. Sandy's shawl fell from her shoulders. He picked it up, draped it gallantly, made some laughing remark about the beautiful red-haired senorita.

Murillo came over deliberately, rearranged the shawl. When he and Sandy were alone he said: "I wish you'd be a little more circumspect, Sandy. It doesn't look well to be flirting with every man you meet."

At the time it seemed absurd. She passed it off with a breezy "Oh, you go to blazes, Benny Venuto! What do you think you are—Anthony Comstock?"

Now she perceived he meant it seriously. He thought he had a right to order her about. But this was his nature—the way he was brought up. She had no right to blame him for these things. Why, it was ridiculous to get hysterical over them. He was a kind, good man — everyone would say so.

She repeated to herself, "KIND —GOOD . . ." Boiling tears ran down her cheeks. She wiped them off viciously. Kind, good . . . Why, when they had come into the room a few hours ago he had closed the door in a ceremonious way. He said to her: "Now, Sandy dear, I'll forget about this afternoon. We won't have any more affairs like that, will we?" And he began to kiss her.

She sank lower in the chair, wincing when she heard him snore. Marriage couldn't sanction things like this. It was wrong. It was frightful. She'd not bear it! She belonged to herself — HERSELF! No one else owned her body and soul.

She repeated this wildly—body and soul—

All Ben Murillo wanted — She pressed her hands against her lips, she bit at the knuckles, saying again and again: "But that's all! That's all!"

Why, he didn't even guess that her whole mind was aflare with hatred. He would have gasped to awaken and find her rifling here at the open window, her teeth chattering with nervous revolt. He thought she was sleeping in contrite peace. She'd learned her lesson. She'd kissed the rod that whipped her. He only wanted gently to guide her in proper wifely dignity. All right for Sandy McNeil to laugh like a hoyden. She was Mrs. Murillo now —she must remember this.

She grew weak with storm. She stole to the bathroom, washed her hands, looked at her tear-stained face, laughed a little. "Beauty!" she mocked. "Not much of a beauty now!"

She bent her face in the pool of water. She dried it slowly, hiding it in the towel.

She said to herself: 'Another day—another night—No!"

Suddenly she became very quiet. She filled her nails, pretending not to feel the surging heat that was wrapping over her as her thoughts took shape.

Finally she said — "Yes — I will!"

She went noiselessly back to the room, found her husband's clothes. Her hand felt through the pockets.

She found his wallet. How he liked to flash those greenbacks. She stooped down so that she could see the figures. She took out five ten dollar bills.

She doubled them up with a little frantic sob.

She ran back to the bathroom and began to dress.

VERDICT AWAITS RAISING SUNKEN SUBMARINE S-51

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

BOSTON, Oct. 29.—Evidence brought to light when the sunken submarine S-51 is raised, including engine room and deck logs, will be laid before the naval board of inquiry, investigating the collision off Block Island, which cost the lives of 33 men.

The board today exhausted its list of witnesses, including those from the steamship City of Rome, involved in the collision, and adjourned sine die, pending the raising of the S-51. If the vessel is not raised within a month, it was announced, the board will be reconvened to clear up the case and make its findings.

Testimony to the effect that late in August the New York-Boston steamer H. F. Dimock came within 50 or 60 feet of colliding with a submarine in Long Island Sound last August because the submarine failed to show the required lights, was introduced at the hearing today.

The testimony was given by Roland M. Litchfield, second officer of the steamer, called today by counsel for the Ocean Steamship company, which operated the steamer City of Rome and which was involved in the collision with the S-51, in which the submarine was sunk with 33 men on the night of September 25 last.
