KLANSMAN ENTERS CANADA, SECOND IS HELD, 3rd OUSTED

VANCOUVER, B. C., Nov. 12.—Admittance to Canada as a tourist was gained by Dr. K. K. Allen of Portland, and organizer of the Kanadian Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, it was disclosed today. Immigration officials stopped his coworker, Luther I. Powell, of White Rock on the border south of here.

If it can be proved he is engaged in organization work he is liable to deportation, immigration officials declared. They said he was an "imperial lecturer" billed to speak here tonight.

Theodore Turner of Portland, faced deportation today on appearance before a board of inquiry. He was alleged to be an employe of the Klan, and in Canada without permission of the government.

"SANDY"

By ELENORE MEHERIN

THE STORY SO FAR

Sandy McNeil, of Spanish lineage, marries Ben Murillo, a wealthy Italian, to please her impoverished family. She sacrifices her love for Timmy, a boyhood sweetheart. Her married life is a series of humiliations by Murillo. She writes to her cousin, Judith More, a San Francisco stenographer, for advice and possible assistance in her plight. Then discovery that a young life is hovering near, seems to cement her bondage. Murillo prevents friends of Sandy attending their housewarming. On one of her lonely walks she encounters Timmy and asks him to give her a "lift in his car. On reaching home she encounters Murillo's rage. He tells her she may go, as she threatens to do, after their child is born. A baby boy arrives and death hovers near him, while both Sandy and Murillo suffer agony.

CHAPTER 23

It was wrapped in cotton. She could only see its small, wrinkled face, the mouth open with its faint, hurried breath. But when Sandy looked at it she felt happy and laughed. It opened its eyes, big, dark, appealing.

"It's looking at me," she whispered in astonished joy.

The nurse laughed.

"It doesn't see me. When will it?"

"Not for quite some time."

Sandy put her fingers lightly against its cheek, wishing that it would stir, that it would cry. She said. "It breathes so quickly."

"Al babies breathe that way."

"Do they all lie so quiet?"

"No—but you must give this one a chance. I'll take it back now."

"A minute more." Then Sandy touched her lips to the little troubled forehead, brushed her cheek against the baby's speaking to it. "Little darling, oh, dead, wee thing." Her eyes filled with tears.

* * *

She fancied the child understood her. It had a wise look. Its spirit listened when she spoke, knew how she longed to fold it in her arms and how wildly she loved it.

Some day it would speak to her. She would tell it all this. She smiled, drifted into sleep.

Her sleep was always filled with dreams. Now she was walking in the hills, carrying the baby. She grew tired and set it down on a tuft of leaves, put her arms across it and fell asleep. In the dream she awakened, went to lift the child. It was gone.

She looked about distractedly. From across the canyon she heard it cry and began running in the direction of the sound—quicker, quicker, her feet flying over the loose drift. She called to it: "Wait—wait—I'm coming——"

From hill to hill she went racing, climbing them breathless, beating her hand against her throat because it got so dry. Now she caught hold of a sapling, helping herself upward. The cries grew faint—farther distant.

They were down there by the water. Easier to run down the hills. She saw them. He wore a little white sailor suit and was gathering pebbles in a red tin bucket. He was very intent. Yet he saw her and waved his hand. He waited for her.

She caught up with him. She was about to say: "Darling—why did you come so far?" when he laughed and darted into the water. She reached after him. A wave swept the two of them, but she held fast. The wave ebbed, flung her back on the shore. The boy was gone. She saw him—saw him roll on the crest, raise up his little hand—disappear.

She screamed——

"What is it? No, dear! Don't try to get up." They were holding her back.

She struggled. "Let's go! I must!"

She opened her eyes, shaking with weakness and exhaustion. She said faintly: "I dreamed."

Her mother sat by the bed, in a dim, fading twilight. She stroked Sandy's arm. There was something piercing in her quiet and the way her fingers moved so softly.

"Is it evening already?" Sandy asked.

"Yes."

"I slept hours and hours, did I?"

"Off and on—yes."

Her brother clasped Sandy's fingers, pressed her lips to them, murmuring. "Sandy — Sandy, dear."

That frightened her. She said in a hushed, strained voice: "Mother, stood down." And she looked in her mother's face. You're crying!"

"No—no—"

"You are!" Then Sandy freed her hands, pulled the blankets up—up to her forehead. After a long while she said: "Tell me! You tell me!"

"There isn't anything to tell.'

"But you're crying! I saw you. And I know! Is it dead?"

"No."

"You're waiting for it to die! Oh, God—"

"Sandy—you must be brave. If God wants to take it you must bow."

Sandy gave a faint, sobbing laugh. How easy for her mother to talk of bowing. It was all she knew. The soft, pleading voice going on and on: "Don't flout the Lord, Sandy. I lost three children. I had to bear it. He gives and He takes away. He will heal you if sorrow comes."

Then Sandy began to cry, remembering how still the baby seemed and that she had only kissed it once—remembering the bound of joy when its eyes opened that way. When she cried the pain in her head became terrible, and the people moving about the room were phantoms.

There were three of them now. She burrowed her head in the pillows.

Her mother whispered: "Here is Ben, dear. I'll go now—" and her mother moved from that chair and Murillo came over and took it.

He touched Sandy's hand. She drew in her breath. It was a knife, hot and sharp that went stabbing down her throat and stabbing till it stuck in her heart.

She didn't look at him. She couldn't force her eyes to meet his. He said: "Oh, Sandy."

She seaded her lips. She told herself silently: Don't cry. Oh, God, keep me from cdying. Don't let him see."

The walls of the room were coming together. They were smothering her. The room was filled with flowers and its walls were closing on her, like that night of her honeymoon and he came toward her with arms extended and half closed, languid eyes.

She could hardly breathe. She was overpowered with the heat and the panic. She said: "My head! It's so hot!"

The nurse brought ice bags Sandy murmured: "I'm crowded—there's not enough room."

It grew dark—silent again—only the nurse now bringing her water, holding the glass. Sandy said: "Where are they all?"

"It's very late. They're gone home.

"Oh then it's still living? They wouldn't go if it were dying?"

The nurse had her back turned. She said: "Here—now you must rest again."

Sandy said accusingly: "It's dead!"

"No—"

"Then bring it in and let me see it! Oh, if it's going to die, I want to hold it. I should hold it!"

She couldn't see the nurse face. She tried to fight against the thing she was putting in her mouth. She said protesting: "Bring it—they've all gone and left it—I want it here—"

* * *

In the morning they brought it to her. They brought it because she became wild demanding it. Because she shouted that it was hers. She had a right to it. And she tried to spring from the bed.

So they brought it in a little dress of white. It was lying on a pillow with its hands that were so perfect, dear little hands, folded one over the other, the small pointed fingers spread.

And someone had put a single spray of lilies of the valley in its hand.

Sandy looked at it. She said to the nurse: "Put it down here."

She kissed its fingers. She laid her cheek against its face. She whispered to it. "Oh, you're dead—you don't hear me—you're dead!"

It's face was so cold against hers. She wanted to warm it. She said wildly: "It's cold—oh, it's so cold."

And she clung to it, folding it in her arms, holding it a long while, smiling ever so sweetly at it, speaking to it. The child of its small, quiet body went through her. She put it against her breast and she said: "This won't do any good. Oh, I know it won't do any gold. Because you're dead—"

Finally they took it from her.

Cook with gas.

LOCAL MAN WANTED FOR KILLING PHEASANTS

KLAMATH FALLS, Nov. 13.—A warrant issued for the arrest of an alleged game hog who it is charged shot 15 China pheasants in one day's shoot, it became known today. He is J. C. Gazely and according to reports is now in Roseburg.

Whether or not the sheriff's office will wire a warrant to Roseburg or await the return of Mr. Gazely to Klamath Falls before serving the warrant was not known.

Gazely, it is claimed, hunted through the Klamath basin country one day and before the day's hunting was through had 15 birds in his possession, it is charged.

MEN ARRESTED HERE FOR GRANTS PASS OFFICERS ARE GIVEN FINES.

J. Roseberry, who was arrested here last week upon a warrant from Grans Pass, charging him with selling insurance without a license, was fined $100 after entering a plea of guilty in the Justice Court at Grants Pass. Roseberry was selling "bad check" insurance, and had failed to procure a license to operate in this state. When arrested in this city he was accompanied by a young married woman from California, and a white slave charge was investigated by the government, but was not pressed against him.

E. B. May, who was also arrested here upon the request of Grants Pass officials, was fined $70 and costs. He was accused of stealing watches from the store at Carr's Corner. C. M. Warren, who was May's companion, paid the amount of the fine and both men were released.

Men's suits cleaned and pressed, $1.50. Roseburg Cleaners, phone 472.
