"SANDY"

By ELENORE MENNERIN

THE STORY SO FAR
Sandy McNeil, forced by her impoverished family into a loveless marriage with Ben Murillo, a rich man, sacrifices her love for Timmy, a childhood sweetheart. Murillo's tyranny and insistence causes her to write to Judith Moore, a San Francisco cousin, for help in escaping her marital bondage. But Judith is absent on a long vacation. A son is born, dying almost immediately. In unutterable loneliness, Sandy appeals to her Uncle Bob, who enables her to take a Honolulu trip with her mother. There she meets Ramon Worth, and drives and dances with him. Leaving Murillo's letters to her unopened, she finally receives a cablegram from him, asking why she had not returned.

CHAPTER 29

The night was drenched with stars. A dreamy languor exhaled from all the flowers. Sandy wore a big drooping hat of jade color. It made the red gleam softly, brought a faint glow over her pale features. She walked slowly through the hotel gardens, loitering toward the beach. She was in an expectant mood. She wanted things to happen—exciting, thrilling, and beautiful things. As she went along she pictured another handsome and gallant, walking at her side, his eyes turning to hers with adoration. For two days she had kept very much to herself. She was stormily resentful that Ramon Worth had learned her history. She would have been willing to subtly drop a fact here and there, enhancing her own story. But to have her whole life flaunted before him the way Jack Horace would do it made her feel stripped and shamed. She had revealed herself as a capricious, audacious being—one who shrugged her shoulders in denigrating insolence at a frowning world; a queen who dispenses favors as pleasures her royal whim.

He insisted: "They're offered in the market friendship."
"I accept the friendship but return the beads."
He looped them slowly—frowned. He said, baffled: "I wanted you to have them. I'll offer them three times and you'll take them as Caesar did the crown."
"No, I won't take them because I hate to be given favors. I can't bear to feel grateful to anyone—even a very dear friend."
"Could you bear to go for a drive with me?"
She laughed: "Certainly—because you're the one to be grateful for that!"
He was in the highest spirits—delighted that her resentment had cooled. He missed her these two days. When she refused his invitations he became angry and gloom. He meant, of course, merely to have a fascinating flirtation with this tall, lovely girl; she would go home and he would forget about her.
They would have a gay week or two—nothing more.
So he talked very happily. He was full of flattering attentions. He chuckled merrily at Sandy's frank audacity. He liked to hear her stir her views on men and women, marriage—wives of yesterday—wives of tomorrow.
Sandy entered into it with her old feeling of gypsy exultance. Do as she pleased! She was one born for joy and for love. And this was but a sparkle—dew on a flower—song notes from a bird. Now and then a fear shot thru her. She would stop abruptly, whispering: "What am I doing?"
She was inwardly aware that this affair was not like the affairs with Timmy and Helene or any of the boys of her school set. There was death and power to Ramon Worth—

Once when they were walking through the gardens, Sandy stopped, raised her arm, pointing to the clouds—luminous, blood-red, floating over the mountain tops.
She looked up to his face, lowered the merest bit to hers: "Ramon—did you ever see anything so wonderful?"
He didn't look. He never moved his eyes from hers. His hands went to her shoulders, clasping them. "Yes, You! You're the most beautiful and haunting thing I've ever seen."
She stood breathless, expectant. Waves—naguetic, towering waves—flashed up about her. She flung her head back with a swift intake of breath. Murmured: "Oh, Ramon!" and rushed on—burning.
Reaching home, she remembered his face lowered to hers. She longed for the kiss she hadn't taken.
She lay awake thinking of him. She thought of Judith's words about love. Love that sweeps two hearts together in a flood of music and color.
She saw herself caught in it. Her blood raced. Love like that! How glorious—how beautiful!
She had a right to such a love. All the high-spirited joyfulness of her nature, proof of strength. It was she to be forever denied because of Ben Murillo.
She became burningly excited arguing these rights with her conscience. The love she had missed now seemed priceless beyond all estimate. She dreamed about it as though she were single and though all this darkness and beauty would soon be hers.
She turned from the thought of Murillo in a cold frenzy. She thought: He even killed the child! He had no claim to her. She would be free of him. She would settle the matter definitely. The child she returned. She would ask him quietly to release her. She would go to the city and get a job—begin all life anew.
And she was wise. She was only taking a stray sun beam here. Ramon knew it was but an episode, just as she did.
Her feelings sometimes belied these careless murmurs. She was exuberant in his company—depressed and fearful if he failed to join her on the beach.
One evening he didn't come. He was out in the water, riding on the surf board. She went with a cry out to the raft. They started to swim back.
The water looked so calm. Sandy struck out beyond them. She was a strong and fearless swimmer, moving through the water easily as a mermad.
She treated as she glided. Soon she must be going home—soon those long, tropic days would be over. Grim things confronted her.
She swam slowly, growing a little weary. Her arm seemed heavy. This heaviness increased. She thought irritably: "I'm tired. Why don't I come so far?"
It became an effort to take a stroke. She turned toward the raft. She could see it, nor did she any longer hear the voices. For the first time in her life she became frightened in the water. She began to breathe
