"SANDY"

By ELENORE MEHERIN

WHAT HAS HAPPENED IN THE STORY SO FAR

Sandy McNeil, forced by her impoverished family into a loveless marriage with Ben Aurilio, a rich Italian, sacrifices her love for Timmy, a childhood sweetheart. Frequent quarrels follow. Sandy appeals to her Uncle Bob, who enables her to take a Honolulu trip with her mother. There she meets Ramon Worth, who drives and dances with her, and finally saves her life in the surf. On sailing for home she is surprised to find him a passenger. During the voyage he declares his love.

Go on with the story from here

CHAPTER 33

She heard the waruing of her heart—the way it thumped. But she clasped her hands at his neck. She laughed softly with her lips on his. His arms supporting her trembled—the sweetness of their breaths mingling.

She kept here eyes closed, pushed him genily, "I must go, Ramon."

"Not yet."

"Yes—yes—"

He steadied himself, his hands seizing hers. He pulled her toward the light, searched her face.

"Oh, why are you looking so, Ramon?" She felt painfully the depth of his astonishment and joy.

"To see, Sandy. To see. You meant that, didn't you? You care for me."

A flush swept over her. She stared blankly at his face suffused with light; at his eyes, pleading and proud.

"You meant it, didn't you?"

* * *

She drew her glance forcibly from his. She said, shaken, "Let me go, Ramon." She walked rapidly, listening to his swift, elastic step at her side. He had his head lowered, his chin sunk in his chest.

When she reached her cabin, he looked up and smiled. He said wonderingly, "How beautiful you are!"

She felt along the wall for the hanger, slipped her dress over it.

Her mother turned: "Is that you, Sandy? What time is it? Oh, I'm so warm." So pushed the covers from her, snored.

Sandy was shivering. Her cheeks burned. She lay in the narrow, upper berth, reaching up her arms, till her palms pressed the ceiling.

She felt his face when she pulled it that moment to hers. She closed her eyes, letting the warmth and sweetness touch her. She wished to sink in this memory—the swift gladness of his arms supporting her.

But she couldn't sleep. She lay awake—turning from side to side. Now she saw Ramon's eyes, astonished, pleading and proud. She flushed and was happy—singing with happiness.

Then she heard the clock ticking. It ticked heavily—monotonously. She put her fingers to her ears. Morning now—a few more hours.

* * *

The light streamed through the small window. The crew was rushing about the decks. A clamming and confusion as of houses moving—all the hurly-burly of unloading freight.

A quarter of six—a cool exhilaration in the morning air. Sandy glanced at the dark, purple clouds massing, now rimmed with fire.

She stood at the rail watching these clouds. They swung like magnificent portiers broidered with silver and fire. They parted slowly. The sun came through, floated upward, immense, glowing—a burning globe. The portieres closed behind it, their folds streaming with light.

The day had come.

"Wondrous, Sandy!" He stood beside her—the same joyous look on his face.

"Oh," said she, startled, "were you up all night?"

"Why not?"

She pulled out the corners of her little handkerchief, her fingers trembling. "What makes you so terribly glad, Ramon?"

"What you did, Sandy."

Her heart pinched. "I kissed you before."

"Not like that. You care for me, don't you?"

"You mustn't think about it—mustn't."

"I'll think of nothing else."

"No—I don't want you to. All you said—"

"Is past—meaningless. I love you."

She saw that his breath was bursting, his lips blanched and smiling and the brown, sunny eyes filled with pride and joy.

"I love you, Sandy."

* * *

She was bitterly cold. Her fingers pulled nervously at the handkerchief. She said dumbly: "It shouldn't have happened. Nothing can be done about it."

"It has happened."

"You must forget it, Ramon. Of course you will!"

He stood a little behind her. Now he bent down, his voice thrilling. "I'm not going to forget it, Sandy. This is love, I know. I love you."

"But I'm saying goodby to you, Ramon—goodby—"

"It's too late, Sandy. That's why I followed you. I love you. I knew it then. And you care for me."

She felt unequal to further struggle. "Say goodby to me, Ramon. I may not see you alone again."

He was smiling at her. He closed her hands over the handkerchief, took them between his. Think of me. I love you. I'll see you again—soon—but don't hurry now—we have hours—hours—"

"Let my hands go, Ramon—"

He laughed. "Your lovely hands—the way you clasped them. . ."

She turned abruptly, running down the deck.

She knelt on the floor of the cabin, folding her clothes, jamming them into her suitcase. She lowered her head, sinking her teeth in her lips. "What have I done? Lord!" Now she felt heat surging about her heart; now it was sucked back, ebbing and cold.

* * *

Hills of the city with the eculyptl graceful against the clear September day. Now the spires of St. Ignatius reaching upward, and now, swinging through azure gates, the Memorial Palace gleams on its majestic plateau.

"Oh, Sandy—look—look—" Mrs. McNeil clung to Sandy's hand. She was panting, weak with the long trip, but excited. "How good to be home—nearly home, dear."

Sandy looked over the heads of the passengers who were now crowding the decks. They were calling to each other.

Then she saw him, tall, bronzed, vital. He passed near, eyes laughing: "Goodby, Sandy. See you soon."

Her mother whispered: "Is he going, dear? Walk with him."

Sandy laughed. She kept her glance straight before her—counting the moments, growing warm—growing breathless.

At last they were in. Two men she had danced with stopped, exchanged pleasantries. A little excited group formed about her.

She felt rather than saw her husband. . . saw him hurrying toward her.

She looked at him a moment before she smiled. His cuffs—she drew in her breath, agitated—almost in tears. Alice coming with him. His brows so arched, so black—his moist lips smiling.

He took off his hat—coming toward her before them all—putting his arm about her—this slight, narrow, ceremonious fellow claiming her before them all. Proud of her—his. He said audibly: "Darling!" He kissed her.

She raised her head, knowing that her cheeks were furiously stained. A few feet distant she saw Ramon—saw him hurrying away, face averted. She said miserably: "Hello—hello, Ben."

"You look wonderful, Sandy. You're glad to be back, I know it."

She could scarcely look at him. His hands on her arm were terrible to her. They were weights.

She couldn't move her lips. She raised her palm, rubbed it across her mouth where his had pressed. She felt their impress like a wound—a hurting wound.

LEONARD WILL FIGHT IF DEMAND IS "ENORMOUS"

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 25.—The New York Evening World today quotes Benny Leonard as saying he is ready to return to the ring only "when a good fighter comes along and there is an enormous demand" for the retired lightweight champion to meet him.

Leonard says he wants to fight again and is in condition to do so, but has no immediate intention of re-entering the arena.

Leonard said he thought the lightweights of today were of good calibre, but lacked experience. He indicated that if he returned to the ring he would do so as a lightweight in spite of the general belief that he has outgrown this division.

AGGIES GO THROUGH PACES FOR SO. CALIFORNIA GAME

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

CORVALLIS, Ore., Nov. 25.—Coach Schissler called his Oregon Aggie football squad together last night for the first time since the Idaho game and gave it a light workout in preparation for heavy training for the Southern California game at Los Angeles December 5. Practice consisted mainly of running back a half dozen kick offs and was important only in revealing that the formidable list of cripples was rapidly being reduced.

With the exception of one or two the men have recuperated sufficiently to be out in suits and by the end of the week the entire squad is expected to be back in fighting form.

Does Winter Fill You With Dread?

Better Get Rid of Your Rheumatic Pains and Twinges—NOW.

James H. Allen, of 26 Forbes St., Rochester, N. Y., suffered for years with rheumatism. Many times this terrible disease left him helpless and unable to work.

He finally decided, after years of ceaseless study, that no one can be free from rheumatism until the accumulated impurities, commonly called uric acid deposits, were dissolved in the joints and muscles and expelled from the body.

With this idea in mind he consulted physicians, made experiments and finally compounded a prescription that quickly and completely banished every sign and symptom of rheumatism from his system.

He freely gave his discovery, which he called ALLENRHU, to others who took it, with what might be called marvelous success. After years of urging he decided to let sufferers everywhere know about his discovery through the newspapers. He has therefore instructed Nathan Fullerton and druggists everywhere to dispense ALLENRHU with the understanding that if the first pint bottle does not show the way to complete recovery he will gladly return your money without comment.
