A Week of Children's Cleaning

Do you know that a greater percentage of the school children go the entire year without a thought of having their outer clothing cleaned? Statistics show 500 cases of children's diseases during the later part of the year to one in the first part of the term due to personal and close contact with other children during school hours. Why fumigate the school room, take every precaution with their health, specialists for eyes, ears, nose, teeth, etc., watch for under nourishment and never pay any attention to the proper sanitation of their wearing apparel. During the week beginning December 28 there is being launched all over the land what is to be called a "National School Children's Clothes Cleaning Week." Don't let your child start the next term of school without a thorough and sanitary cleaning of all wearing apparel. Phone 227

"SANDY"

By ELENORE MEHERIN

THE STORY SO FAR.

Sandy McNeil, in love with life, marries Ben Murillo, a rich Italian, to please her impoverished family. Tyranny by Murillo and frequent quarrels follow. A son dies at birth. Bob McNeil, her uncle, aids in plans for Sandy and her mother to take a trip to Honolulu. There she meets Ramon Worth, who saves her life in the surf. On the same steamer home he declares his love. Murillo says he will never release her. Judith Moore, a cousin, tells Sandy ove is everything. Murillo overtakes her as she goes for a tryst with Ramon. He appears, unexpectedly, at a party she is giving for her friends. After the party he strikes her. She leaves his house and accepts the kindly attentions of Ramon, whose home she shares. She receives a telegram from Ramon.

Go on with the story from here:

CHAPTER 57

Sandy took the telegram to the table she had set so prettily near the fireplace. The poppies were closed in long, golden buds.

She read: "Can't get away.—Greatly disappointed. Letter explains. Sending packages parcel post."

She swallowed, took a long, rasping breath with the shaky feeling of one who has passed some desperate crisis. She sat at the table, her heart going quickly and began to eat. She thought: "This is good. I needed this. Now, I'll begin to work. I'll work hard."

And she went about with a cold precision, refusing to notice the quiet; ignoring the tightness and heat at her throat. For three days she worked relentlessly, taking a pleasure in punishing herself.

Then Ramon's letter came. An unexpected reorganization of the firm where he was working called for an examination of the books. He would be kept at it a week or ten days. He was distracted because she might get too lonely. He was sending books and new records for the phonograph and he'd ordered provisions to be sent twice a week.

"There's another bundle, darling girl, that I hope meets with your approval. They have shoppers in the stores here and she picked out these togs, for, of course, not being in the Garden of Eden, you've got to have food and raiment. I hope the shoes are right. I noticed the ones you wore very thin and high heeled But I made a pattern from them and pray the size fits. I'm working day and night in the hope of seeing you next Saturday. Will you look forward to this one-tenth as eagerly as I do I love you more than ever—I think of you, I long for you. I'm tortured with the ache of your loneliness, you dear, brave darling. You are that—I love you. You need me a little—how glad I am to serve you."

In the box was a golf skirt with silk blouses, neckties and expensive sport hose. There was a long, stunning knitted coat and a trig, close fitting felt hat.

Sandy shook them out, examining them minutely. Her hands were cold and trembled violently. She said, quietly: "I have to have them. I can't go about naked! I can pay for them when I get a job." She felt grateful to Ramon and suddenly she began to cry.

But she wouldn't pity herself. She said in a business-like way: "I'll have to borrow to get started. I can borrow from Ramon. I can pay it back."

And she hammered at the typewriter. Every night she washed out her underwear, set it before the fire to dry. Sometimes she put it on damp, thinking sombrely: "It doesn't matter . . . nothing matters."

These despondent moods came only when she was excessively tired — when she had punished herself with long, relentless hours practicing shorthand or typing. Usually, there run through all her thoughts a young, robust confidence. Things would turn out! Hit the ceiling again! Oh, wait a few months and Murillo would grow weary, finding their bond only a burden.

He would agree—even demand a separation. Then he could dash about on all the wild adventures he wished. No one would have the right to protest. He would even find some to justify him.

She would be released; all the sweet, breezy gaiety of her girlhood returned. Well—of course this would happen! Twenty-one and all of blitheness and youth before her—

Toward the end of the second week the hope for this solution deceived a final blow. It came in the usual acrimonious letter from Alice.

Your husband called today and went up to mamma's room. I followed. I sat myself there. He tried to stare me out of countenance and, failing, said: "Mother McNeil—in that voice of his — I'd like to talk with you alone. May I?"

Ma gives me the dignified nod to bow myself out. It made me pretty furious, so I told him: "Mother's not well. Kindly don't excite her!" Ma was horrified and came back with: "Alice, I'm surprised!" and to him: "The poor girl's tired. Don't be offended, Ben, dear."

They spoke in whispers. The doors were closed. So, sharp as my ears are, I heard almost nil."

When he came out I said cordially: "Has your wife fully recovered from the smash-up?"

For a minute it appeared like my turn for a crack in the jaw had arrived. He came right up to me with a crouching, animal look. He snarled in my teeth: "My sister is entirely recovered, thank you!"

I fond ma in tears. She says, "Alice, where is Sandy? She's not with Judith. Ben has learned this. Now I wont you tell me the truth?"

I got huffy and said I'd not be drawn into the Murillo mess. Plentious weeps from me. "Ben thinks Sandy has left him for good, Alice. He thinks she means to get a divorce."

"Why shouldn't she. You saw that picture. You know what it means."

"Alice! A single girl to entertain such ideas! It was Ben's sister. I'm ashamed of you. Now I want you to write to Sandy and tell her that her husband will fight any effort on her part to put aside her vows. Divorce will not permit him to remarry. He is not going to release Sandy. Tell her that her mother and father, deeply as they are grieved, cannot countenance her defiance. They will be forced to take sides against her."

This got my goat. I said: "Who'd want her to come back and he's chasing all over the country with another woman?"

Ma's lips tight: "That's not the truth. And if it were your sister drove him to it!"

* * *

As Sandy read this she saw the curls falling on her mother's plump, warm neck. How often she had kissed these. How she had loved teasing and kissing Isabel. But Isabel turning against her! Sitting with compressed lips—stern and cold in judgment.

"I don't care!" she said quickly, flinging her head back.

But she did care. She let the dog strain at the leash, let him race her along, the wind and salt in her mouth, the hair flying about her face. "It's the spray!" she told herself angrily, when her eyes were wet and stinging. She tugged at the dog, pulling him to her side with a resentful: "Quit yanking! Can't you walk along like a decent dog?" He sniffed at her feet, looked up inquiringly and began glibly and generously licking her hand. Tears rushed down her cheeks.

She came to the dunes—white, rippling hills hidden by the murmuring trees. Quiet here—so quiet that one's step sank noiseless, leaving no footprint. She let her feet go down ankle-deep, imagined herself disappearing in the gleaming, quiet sands. Isabel would cast her off—would take Murillo's part, thinking it right that Sandy's life should be ironed-out, blanched and joyless.

"Ironed out. That's your fate," a voice whispered. "Lucky to stay on here a lonely prisoner all the days of your life. Bound to him. You had your chance. You think you'll get another? That a great, beautiful love is waiting for you? It's not! You've finished!"

She considered this, blazing and mutinous. Her mother's words assaulted her. They would take Murillo's part—stand against her.

* * *

She could no longer work, so furious was her resentment. She now went about with a feeling of beating against closing walls — She was in a pit—the cliffs drawing together, meeting over her head.

When she looked at the ocean she whispered: "I can't get away. I'll never be free." And she sat hours watching the waves billowing so far out there, coming in immense, rolling contours to the shore — water, unlimited, except for the jutting of Point Isobos, and there, a Pebble Beach, like an etching, a tree, in wistful grace against the turquoise sky. She fancied herself lost on a raft on the measureless sea. No one would care. Her mother's reputation was crushing and incredible. It obliterated all the old, dear ties.

She would never go back. No—stay here—what did they care—throw her to Murillo. She caught the dog's neck, whispering, "God, it's lonely here!"

When she returned to the house and found provisions waiting, she thought of Ramon with a storm of gratitude. The only friend in the wide world!

She had a wish to dash away, lose herself in the crowds, flirt, dance, drink, go roaring wild. Why not?

* * *

She came to dread the darkness — the long quiet evenings with the room throwing echoes at her—with the silence whispering, "You'll never get free! Swallow it!" The tapping of the tree at the window set her walking nervously. She said words out loud in the sheer longing to hear a voice. When another week passed and then another, with Ramon writing. "It will be five days more at least before I can leave here," she grew frantic because of the quiet and the waves dashing so relentlessly against the rocks—the boom and the roar and the vast, ceaseless monotony.

Then the weather changed. For days the sky was overcast, the waters gray. A wind howled through the trees.

Sandy lay awake at night, listening to that tree tapping and tapping; to the wind hurling pebbles against the door. All night the wind wandered about the house. The dog took to running with his nose along the ground. She put her hands over her eyes and cried softly. "I'll leave in the morning . . . I won't stay here another night." The dog crouched at the door, giving unearthly, protesting moans when the windows rattled.

"Lord, isn't this awful," Sandy whispered: "awful." She lay there planning wild, brilliant revenge against the wind — the tapping tree, Murillo.

She awakened feverish, ready to cry, with alarm at the slightest sound. At 10 o'clock she put on her sweater.

She was running down the walk.

Ramon came.
