"SANDY"

By ELENORE MEHERIN

THE STORY SO FAR.

Sandy McNeil, in love with life, marries Ben Murillo, a rich Italian, to please her impoverished family. Tyranny by Murillo and frequent quarrels follow. A son dies at birth. Bob McNeil, her uncle, aids in plans for Sandy and her mother to take a trip to Honolulu. There she meets Ramon Worth, who saves her life in the surf. On the same steamer home he declares his love. Murillo says he will never release her. Judith Moore, a cousin, tells Sandy ove is everything. Murillo overtakes her as she goes for a tryst with Ramon. He appears, unexpectedly, at a party she is giving for her friends. After the party he strikes her. She leaves his house and accepts the kindly attentions of Ramon, whose home she shares. She receives a telegram from Ramon, saying that his business will keep him away for at least a week. But he came back that night.

Go on with the story from here:

CHAPTER 58

They stood on a rock with the waves rumbling at their feet, spray dashing in their eyes. Sandy held her face toward it and laughed. She thought, trembling: "Why do I want to shout? Why am I so glad?"

Ramon watched her, the sunny brown eyes filled with eagerness and question. Was she glad he'd come? She kissed him so. She flung her arms about him gayly as a child might have, and drew his head down. But how pale she looked; how dark those shadows under her eyes.

Sandy guessed these thoughts of his and turned with an impetuous: "Oh, I'm so glad you're here! Even the sky looks different!"

She watched the clouds hanging low over the gray, rising waters; that tree resisting the wind. And all this that had seemed so desolate was now touched with a piercing, melancholy spleador — as though she and Ramon were alone in the world. They loved each other and were alone. They were standing on the edge of these many waters. With thumping hearts and eyes speaking,though their lips were still.

Sandy thought: "He loves me. He wants to do things for me. How good to have his hands holding me. Oh, how beautiful life could be! How glad and sweet."

And he: "She cares. She surely cares. Good God——".

* * *

They walked quickly. The spray flew out and caught them. Once a big wave threw a handful of water in Sandy's hair. She shook the drops in Ramon's face.

He leaned over her, laughing: "You dear, gorgeous thing."

She waited, taunting and radiant for his kiss.

Then she became quiet, keeping her face averted as she helped her to th car.

They drove those miles along the white, gleaming shore. The black clouds flew before them, the cypress trees shut out the winds with distracted arms. They seemed running, disconsolate from the sea.

Sandy thought: "Oh, there's a great storm coming. It's cold."

But she was warm—flushing and warm. She wished to reach up and touch with her fingers her mouth where his lips had pressed. She wanted to say aloud, to shout: "I have a right to this—to anything."

The loneliness of the past weeks made her thought cling to him. She glanced stealthily at his intent face and could easily have whispered: "Stay with me, Ramon. I can't go back to being so alone. I won't let you go! I don't want to be pushed back thre like a forgotten thing. Don't leave me, Ramon. Don't listen if I tell you to go. I want you. I want your arms here. Lean down and say you love me. Look at me that way. Say it again and again!"

* * *

They turned through the forest: through lanes where the pines murmured in their lofty quiet. They came to a hill. Ont and below them ran the beautiful curve of the Monterey shore. Even with the March storm astride the waves the water looked blue. Boats tossed jauntily.

And for a moment, sun tore the clouds apart, sweeping with a little flourish over the hills a random greeting.

"Did you see that, Sandy? I think this is one of the loveliest views in the world. We'll have a lot of fun discovering this old place together. Remember the night we drove to the Pali? Does it seem to you that we've known each other many years? Funny, but I find myself thinking always of hills or trees or clouds we've looked at together and never of anything else, as though other times and other people didn't exist—odd, isn't it?—"

He looked down at her, the unruly brows seeming to smile. And he began to tell her when he first was sure he loved her — th night he carried her from the water.

"I knew then, Sandy, that I wasn't going to get away with it."

"You wanted to?"

"Not now. At first, of course. Now — no matter what might be—"

"You don't care that much, Ramon?—" Warmly — seeking his eyes—saying to herself: "I don't care! I've a right to SOMETHING!"

Shivering — almost unable to breathe when he whispered hourse ly: "Oh yes, Sandy—that much!"

* * *

The light was failing the way the clouds massed over the sun. The wind blew as though the night were coming. All at once it began to rain.

"Oh, I knew there'd be a storm," Sandy put out her hands, startled, because tears rushed to her eyes. She thought: "Oh, its getting late. He'll soon be going."

And when they reached the house she looked up at him, laughing hysterically. "You know, it got so that I just dreaded coming in here alone. I couldn't bear to open the door and feel the darkness reaching out. But I hated the wind and the fog and the sea booming."

"You were that lonely?"

"Maybe that was it . . . but I guess I'm over it——"

"You can't stay on here. Oh, my dear little thing, you'll have to go where it'll be brighter—"

"No — I'm used to it — perhaps. There's no place else I can go—this is the best place in the world for me for a while." She glanced about the big, shadowy room.

"You know, Ramon, I'm taking all this as a loan. I don't know what I would have done if you hadn't helped me. You'll have to regard me as a war orphan. By and by, when I'm competent, you will get me a job. I'm hurrying so that it won't be long . . . then I'll pay you back to the last sou. You agree to all this?"

He came up and clasped his arms about her shoulders: "Keep track of the eggs and butter, Sandy."

He looked at her pale, smiling lips, the red hair blown across her forehead. He thought with a pang: "She's afraid. Of me or herself? She's warning us."

* * *

His pity was almost as great as his love. He raised her face and whispered: "Yes—I agree. Poor, little darling. Do you think I care how or why you're taking it? I'm so glad it's I you chose to serve you. Because I love you. I love you greatly. You say you like being loved. You want to be adored. You are!"

She listened, her eyes shining and dilated. Then she pushed from him, trebling and laughing. "That such moments end! Ramon, isn't it a pity that we can't just choose some sweet minute and stretch it out forever. Like the bugs imprisoned and unmortalized in your string of jade."

He knelt and made the fire. She set the table, watching his bronzed profile illumined by the flame. She thought: "A few more hours . . . Alone again—no! —" She ran into the little cupboard of a kitchen and went dashing about with dishes. She stirred things on the stove. She ran back to look at him.

He kicked a log to place, regarded her quizzically. "Well — what now?"

"It's nice having someone here."

"Would anyone do, Sandy?"

"It's nice having you here."

He came up laughing. They went arm and arm to the kitchen. Once he asked: "You won't ever go back, Sandy?"

"God, no!"

"Do you care for me a little?"

"Why, today—oh, I don't know — Yes — Of course I do! Of course."

His face under its tan paled. She thought. "That much! He loves me that much. I'm glad."

The candles on the table fluttered when the wind blew through a crack. The rain was scampering on the roof.

They sat before the fire listening to wind and rain. How the wind went scooting over the rocks. It shrieked and stooped and flung the pebbles upward.

Sandy drew her shoulders together, huddling against him when Shaggy ran with his nose against the ground. "He does that," she whispered. "He hates the wind."

Ramon's arm tightened.

She closed her eyes. "Now he'll be leaving—now I'll be alone."

He kissed her. She clung to him. She thought, "Why is the world so? Why can't he stay? I don't care—what do I care!"

"You're frightened, Sandy, and afraid of the storm?"

"Oh, last night the wind kept blowing—it howled all night."

"You're afraid—"

"No—it's late—you'll have to go."

"Do you want me to go? Do you really want me to go?"

She nuded. "Yes." She ran and got his coat—held it. Her hands trembled. "Yes—go—it's an awful night to send you into, isn't it? Kiss me. You can find the way!"

He ran his hand slowly over his hat. He didn't look at her. "I'll come tomorrow, Sandy. I won't leave till the afternoon—"

"Yes—come tomorrow." She let herself lean against the door, holding it open against the wind. She laughed and said, "Goodby, ole dear!" And kissed him.

* * *

His steps were lost in the sound of the wind and the water. She closed the door. The candles blew out. Shadows fled across the walls—the flames were dying.

She leaned there, hearing the wind go sweeping over the rocks, the pebbles flying. Then the tree tapped on the window and the dog came up and whined against her knee.

She flung the door open. She went dashing out, calling softly, wildly: "Ramon—Ramon—"

No answer. The wind swooped against her—blew her down the path.

"Ramon—oh, Ramon—are you gone?"

Above the shouting of the wind: "Sandy!" Hhe flew forward her, caught her in his arms.

She clung to him, shaking — half fainting: "Don't leave me —I don't want to be alone. . ."

"Darling—darling—" He lifted her in his arms. He carried her back to the house.

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

PAGOSA SPRINGS, Colo., Dec. 24.—This little community is in sorrowing after a pre-Christmas tragedy Tuesday night which claimed the life of Mrs. William Bartlett, 21.

She was shot and killed at a dance near here when Miss Minnie Hicks, a school teacher, wrestled with her for possession of a rifle which Miss Hicks had obtained to frighten two youths who were fighting.

The weapon discharged in the tussle between the two women and Mrs. Bartlett fell dead.

NEW TRIAL DENIED MAN TWENTY YEARS IN PRISON

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

KANSAS CITY, Kansas, Dec. 24.—Federal Judge John C. Pollock today refused a motion for a new trial for Vuco Perovich, Montenegran nobleman, who has served 20 years of a life sentence in the federal prison at Leavenworth. He also refused to permit Perovich to be sent back to Alaska to hang.

Perovich was released November 7 under personal bond of $1,000 on a writ of habeas corpus.

In 1904 he was found guilty in the United States district court in Alaska of murdering a miner in an Alaskan village and was sentenced to death. The case was appealed to the supreme court of the United States which affirmed the decision; but later President Taft commuted the sentence to life imprisonment.

Perovich has sought his liberty on the ground that the president had no right to commute the sentence.

Something for everybody! Purses, gift sets, perfume, toilet water, bill folds, key rings, stationery, cards, candy, incense and numerous other useful and beautiful gifts. Lloyd Crocker.

ENGLAND PREFERS PEACE WITH TURKS OVER MOSUL.

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

LONDON, Dec. 24. — Preparations for the negotiation of the treaty for extension of the British mandate over Irak (Mesopotamia) are complete and the parleys will begin soon after Christmas, probably at Bagdad, where the treaty will be drawn up for submission to the two governments. It will provide a maximum mandate period of 25 years, in accordance with the award of the league of nations council in the dispute between Turkey and Great Britain over the territory of Mosul, which lies in northern Irak. Upon its completion and ratification the league will ask that it be registered as part of the Mosul award.

Despite the league decision, it is learned in official quarters that Premier Baldwin during his conversation with the Turkish ambassador here yesterday left the door open for a discussion between the two governments regarding Mosul if Turkey feels disposed to take advantage of such an opportunity.

A Week of Children's Cleaning

Do you know that a greater percentage of the school children go the entire year without a thought of having their outer clothing cleaned?

Statistics show 500 cases of children's diseases during the later part of the year to one in the first part of the term due to personal and close contact with other children during school hours. Why fumigate the school room, take every precaution with their health, specialists for eyes, ears, nose, teeth, etc., watch for under nourishment and never pay any attention to the proper sanitation of their wearing apparel. During the week beginning December 28 there is being launched all over the land what is to be called a "National School Children's Clothes Cleaning Week." Don't let your child start the next term of school without a thorough and sanitary cleaning of all wearing apparel. Phone 227
