"SANDY"

THE STORY SO FAR. Sandy McNeil, in love with life, marries Ben Murillo, a rich Italian, to please her impoverished family.

Go on with the story from here:

CHAPTER 59

In that way the pathetic and tragic relationship began. Sandy went alone along the water's edge.

She watched the cloud floating onward. With her young face upturned and the breeze flitting thru her hair, she looked with a figure of Springtime.

Then Ramon came. She kept her face toward the water, knowing that her young face upturned and the breeze flitting thru her hair, she looked with a figure of Springtime.

"I care for you, Ramon." "And you will marry me, Sandy."

"How can I? Oh, you know." "I don't care for myself. Only for you, I want you on any terms. Any at all. And you?"

She reached up her hands, held his face a moment, then drew it down to hers. "Don't look so, Ramon. You frighten me. Laugh. I like you most when you're laughing."

He listened with warm, thundering heart and again tears rushed to her eyes. Beautiful—tender and beautiful to be loved like this.

She remembered with a flush the wild sweetness of his voice: "Darling—darling—"

They took long walks. They drove along the shore. When the sun came out warm and bright, they went into the sea racing in—racing out.

Sandy shook out the shining hair. She laughed when Ramon lowered his wet face to hers. She threw back her head, smiling: "I'm glad, Ramon! Glad for everything. Oh, are those tears in your eyes? Are you laughing or crying?"

"Both—dearest—both—"

She whispered to herself: "It's the truth! I'm glad! I don't feel any different. Why should I?"

And finding that warm, tender look fixed in her face, finding the sunny, brown eyes following her so eagerly, she became light-hearted.

When they sat before the fire, he held her hands. He told her they were married—this was their home. Then thoughts flashed through her mind like knives. She would imagine her mother opening the door—the shock and terror of her mother's eyes. She covered her face, pressing it against his shoulder.

"So you have to go tomorrow?" "I won't go tomorrow, Sandy." "The next day. What shall I do alone?"

So he put it off day after day. A week passed. Sunset. They stood on the cliff against the gnarled, lone cypress tree. Far out, the sun was a blood red chalice floating on the sea.

His bronzed, happy face had a quiet austerity—a draw suffering now with the hush of the twilight folding down and about them from every hill and tree.

"Promise me, Sandy—Sandy darling, that you won't regret . . . you won't give way to sadness when I'm gone."

"When you're alone—but I won't leave you very long. I'm afraid of that for you. I'll return soon to stay—to stay always. I wish it were I that I were to bear it all. I could fill the time."

"I don't care for myself. Only for you, I want you on any terms. Any at all. And you?"

She reached up her hands, held his face a moment, then drew it down to hers. "Don't look so, Ramon. You frighten me. Laugh. I like you most when you're laughing."

I had a child and any man treated her as he treated me, I would fight for her to the end of time. And I'd want her to know what gladness could be. I love you, Isabel, and it breaks my heart to have to stay away always. But I'm going to. My plans are all very carefully worked out—I know just what I'm going to do—"

She paused here. She gave a low, shaky laugh, seeing herself an exile, shut off on this lonely coast with the days and days of solitary wandering up and down the beach—in and out of the forest—hours sitting in the dunes.

"That's my life!" she shouted, her heart thumping in terror. "From now on!"

BOY FARMERS ON COW CREEK TRAP BIG BLACK BEAR

Lloyd Garrett and Ray Morgan, the two bareheaded boys that are farming the lower Miller place on Applegate Creek, and as a side issue have a string of traps all over the hills thereabouts were exceedingly lucky last Saturday when a big black Bruin came their way.

At this Lloyd and Ray saw they were up against the real thing in trapping. They built the house, using 400 spikes the better to secure the brush over the house.

He listened with warm, thundering heart and again tears rushed to her eyes. Beautiful—tender and beautiful to be loved like this.
