OFFICERS OF LAW TO BE ORGANIZED

(Associated Press Local Wire.)
 MEDFORD, Ore., Feb. 13.—At a meeting held last night at Ashland, peace officers of Jackson, Josephine, Klamath and Coos counties, Oregon, and Siskiyou county, California, took the preliminary steps toward perfecting an organization of all officers from constable to judge. The object is the better handling of the law enforcement agencies, and the suppression of crime.

T. A. Rafferty of Salem, head of the state traffic department; A. E. Burghdoff, federal narcotic agent; Sam Malehorn, deputy sheriff of Coos county, and E. L. Elliot, district attorney of Klamath county, were the principal speakers. All phases of the criminal situation were discussed, from fingerprints, to evidence getting. Another meeting will be held in April, the place as yet unselected.

"SANDY"

By ELENORE MEHERIN

CHAPTER 101.

Judith rode in the front seat with Hal Hume. She thought of that first Tuesday night when she sat here—the night they went to Tait's. She heard Douglas twitting Sandy. And Judith knew from their flushed, happy glances that they were infatuated with each other—already, in their first few hours' infatuation.

She heard him murmuring now—saying anxious, tender things to Sandy.

They had put pillows and a blanket in the back seat, making Sandy lie here. Douglas sat on the box. He held her hand—soft hand, appealing like a child's in the dimness he could just make out her face and the red, shining hair.

Sandy's face was quiet—pale as a statue. In the still figure beside him was no trace of the radiant Sandy he had first seen standing at the door, tilting her mouth upward gaily for a boy to kiss.

She wanted to put her hand over her face. So often lately had come into the room and found her so. And often he had found her wet lashes against his lips. He remembered a thing Sandy said on New Year's eve: "You really care for me, Douglas? If you could choose any girl in the world, would it still be I? I wish you'd say it ten thousand times. I've come so near to happiness—I always miss it!"

And another time she told him, trembling: "Even the baby died. I wanted it so—I needed it so!"

He stooped now and touched her cheek. How delicate these white, lovely features. Her eyes opened, smiled faintly. He felt pained and stricken, shaken to the soul.

He wanted to take her in his arms, rush far away with her—poor, hurt darling—wronged always. But he would hide her away. They wouldn't find her. No one should come and lay a murder at her door.

Tears rushed to his eyes. Murder—they would even bring this to her! Looking at her sweet, loved face, he trembled, recalling that he had wondered—he had even asked: "Might her hand have caught the pistol; not realising it, might she have fired the shot?"

He lowered his face against her hand—kissed the soft palm. She had gone to Klamath in pity. He was certain of this. And if she had fired the gun she had not known—she had not meant to do it. She would never know it—no one would.

They drove quickly. Now and then a solitary tree stood out against the sky—now and then a trail of stars gleamed.

"Where are we going, Douglas?"

"Just a little into the hills."

"Why are you taken me tonight?"

"Does it hurt you? Do you mind the motion of the car?"

"No—answer me, why tonight?"

"Hal said you were also to stand it. And it's better to get away. I've wanted to take you from the very first."

"No one saw you carrying me from the office, Douglas?"

"Not a living soul."

"You're telling me the truth?"

"That's the truth, Sandy—the very truth."

She turned her head, drew him a little so that he stooped nearer to her: "I've made you unhappy. I've not been lucky for you, Douglas. Are your eyes wet, too?"

"Yes—they're wet—I guess they are. You haven't made me unhappy... Only because of what happened to you."

"Maybe it's better that it did happen... I would have made you unhappy if you'd come with me... Oh, Douglas, I wonder if I was going to let you come? I wish I knew if I would have taken you—if I would have let you come..."

"I would have gone, Sandy... I would never have let you go alone. I wanted to go... I love you."

"Do you love me now, Douglas?"

"Oh, Sandy, dear—now Sandy yes, I love you—I'd like to be carrying you in my arms... I'd like to feel your weight... I'd like to be running away with you... I'd like to shield you from the whole world... that's the way I think of you, Sandy—that's the way I love you..."

She sighed, her thought trailing into dreams—a smiling dream. He who was so young, so jubilant and sparkling loved her in this sweet glorious way.

And she pictured him lifting her, carrying her up a sheer precipice; laboring upward and upward! They reached the top—most cliff, where they were alone; where he set her down in tired joy and whispered: "Now, I have you safe. Are you happy?" And she answered, weeping: "Yes—oh, happy!"

She perceived vaguely that her happiness cost him greatly—so she wept about it.

Deep in the Santa Mateo hills was the hunting shack. They went down over the old Ocean Shore road—lonely and picturesque now in the darkness, with the waves leaping to the rocks and the hill-marching in bleak, uncompromising majesty.

Judith sat a little forward, staring at the swine and curve of shadows—vast, endless shadows. Every now and then she stifled the wish to scream out wildly: "Where do these curves end? Where does this blind, God-forsaken road lead? Oh, God, where are we going?"

When they came to the place and Hal Hume helped her out, she hung back a little. She said, shivering: "Oh, is this it? Is this your shack?"

Hume answered solemnly: "Yes, an awful lot to ask of you, Judge. Doug doesn't seem to realize it."

Judith threw her head back proudly. She smiled: "Oh, yes, he does... but he knows I'm glad to do it."

She went in and made up the bed and heated it. She fluffed out the pillows and smoothed them. She said to herself, idly: "I wonder whose name was on that blotter. It's got his name! Why should it be his name?"

She watched him carry Sandy in, saw him lean down, the young hazel eyes filled with tears, saw him kiss Sandy and say some jubilant thing. Sandy's white hands touched his face, held him and made a fire. She thought: "Isn't it cold? It's freezing." She held her palms to the blaze. She kept biting her lips.

She didn't hear Douglas enter. He came over and put his arm around her waist: "Will you be afraid here, Judge?"

"No—I'm never afraid."

"No—I'm never afraid."

"I've got my nerve, Judge, getting you in for this."

"I don't look at it that way, Doug. I guess you know well enough that I'd do this or anything."

"You mean you have to do anything, Judge, anything? Will you stick by her? By Sandy, no matter what turns up?"

"Then it was your name on the blotter, Doug? And you may be brought into this affair."

"I don't know whose name it was. But I want to be ready. I'd feel so much easier, Judge, if I could know you'd stick by her. Will you? In case I shouldn't be able to get down here much? In case something connects me with—"

She kept looking at the stove. Her heart beat.

And she now said softly: "It would be better to have Sandy meet it. Much better."

"You don't know, Judge. And she can't meet it and she's not going to. It took Judith's hand. He forced her to look at him."

"Judith, promise me you will! Won't you? Please, Judge, darling. You see—well—she's never had a square deal—Judge—I love her—"

Judith averted her head quickly. "Oh, this is a case of not, Doug—to the bitter, utter end. She'll be all right—we'll all be all right!"

He gave a happy, boyish laugh: "Gee—I feel better—you won't forget it, Judge—no matter what it means."

"No matter what!"

Judith thought: "You don't know what you ask! Oh, dear, dear God!" Nor did Judith know what she promised.

At 3 o'clock Saturday morning Hal Hume and Douglas drove back to San Francisco.

At 8 Douglas was sitting at the breakfast table with his mother. The bell rang. Without knowing why he got up with an abrupt: "I'd answer it, Hal."

Two tall, bulky forms. He knew who these men were.

The taller spoke: a pleasant voice. They wanted him, Douglas Keith, to give them a little information. Would he kindly come with them to the Hall of Justice? Douglas stood there smiling. Then he locked down the hall and had a sudden, frightened wish to race through the kitchen and out the back door.

He thought desperately: "They have got me! Ze gods, I'm done." He reached for his hat. He said amiably: "Certainly, I'll bid my mother goodbye."

TOURIST CROP IN 1926 LOOKS BIG

(Associated Press Local Wire.)

SALEM, Ore., Feb. 13.—With an increase of 236 per cent over January of 1924 and of 71.5 per cent over the same month of 1925 the prospects for a record breaking harvest of tourists and home seekers travel to Oregon by motor vehicle for 1926 is very auspicious, if the non-resident motor vehicle registration with the secretary of state for the month of January, 1926, can be regarded as an augury.

The registration of foreign motor vehicles in Oregon during the month of January, 1926, amounted to 1,442 as compared to 429 for January of 1924 and 841 for the corresponding month of 1925. January visitors to Oregon by motor vehicles registered from states as far east as Ohio and Virginia, from as far as Kentucky, North Carolina and Texas representing the states of the south, while two sojourning motor vehicles were registered from Alaska and 27 Canada.

MORE LICENSES ISSUED THIS YEAR

(Associated Press Local Wire.)

SALEM, Ore., Feb. 13.—On February 5, there had been 135,478 motor vehicle licenses issued for the year 1926, which is 4,872 in excess of the number of licenses issued to the same date in 1925, according to Secretary of State Koser. This number is in excess of the number of licenses issued in previous years up to the same time and compares favorably with the progress of motor vehicle registrations and has been accomplished notwithstanding the real amount of additional work required by reason of the putting into operation, for the first time this year, of the new certificate of title law.

THEATRES

Antlers Theatre
 Presidents Jefferson, Monroe and Lincoln, Aaron Burr and Lady William Hamilton are among the historic characters in "As No Man Has Loved," the massive screen masterpiece which will run at the Antlers theatre Sunday and Monday.

William Fox, who presents the story, easily recognizable as Dr. Edward Everett Hale's tale of 1863 called "A Man Without a Country," and Director Rowland V. Lee spared neither time or money in its preparation. Historic spots are reproduced with painstaking exactitude, and two huge frigates were built after a study of paintings of famous battlehips of earlier days.

Daring the story a tremendous battle is fought between a battleship and a huge pirate slave ship, with more than 600 men engaged in hand-to-hand fighting with cutlasses. A terrific storm off Cape Hatteras furnishes one of the most daring and exciting scenes ever caught by a camera.

Majestic Theatre
 Her husband, a soldier, is ordered away, but promises to return at the earliest moment possible. Through eleven long years she waits patiently hopefully.

When the husband does reappear it is with another wife. He dies soon, and then Charity—the first wife—takes her rival to her own home.

When infuriated townspeople threaten to punish Hagar, Wife No. 2, because she has become the mother of a fatherless child, Charity flies to her defense. She prevents her from throwing herself into the sea, and is herself caught with her on a narrow ledge of rock in the ocean, where the two are rescued with difficulty.

Then the two widows agree to be mothers to the boy together.

In this brief, is the story of "Tides of Passion," the big Vitagraph photoplay which comes to the Majestic theatre on Sunday. Mae Marsh is the star, and she is supported by a fine cast of players.

Liberty Theatre
 What are said to be the most beautiful natural surroundings in the world, were utilized in the scenic of Associated Exhibitors' new production "Hearts and Flats," which comes to the Liberty theatre next Sunday.

These surroundings are in the heart of the Cascade mountains in western Washington, and Mount Rainier particularly, where the trees measure unbelievable feet in diameter and height.

The story from which the picture was adapted was, queerly enough, written for that particular locality, with its natural scenic beauties in mind. Clarence Budington Kelland, the author, sojourned at the lodge, at Mount Rainier, during one of his summer vacations, and professed to be so enthralled by the country and trees that he wrote the story, which was shortly after published in the American Magazine.

The H. C. Weaver Productions, Inc., who do their filming in and around Tacoma, Washington, found the story so appropriate for the settings they could conveniently offer, that they bought the picture rights.
