OVERLAND OPEN CAR IN DEMAND

A marked feature of the buying demand at the outset of the early spring weather has been the trend toward the touring car model in the Overland line which, at the present time, is being sold in larger numbers than ever before in the history of the company.

While prophets in the industry have been heralding the supremacy of the enclosed models, and while the sedans and coupe types have been marching steadily ahead in new volume figures, the open body type has displayed an elasticity which has surprised even the oldest dealers.

It seems to have become the popular fashion to drive an open car with the top folded back, a practice which developed in the far west country and which has rapidly spread eastward until now it is quite the ordinary thing to see a group, especially of the younger generation, bobbed hair and caps to the breeze, swinging down the highway.

The use of the open car is not restricted to the "shick and flapper" generation, however. Many of the business men, who reserve enclosed cars for their use on formal occasions, are taking advantage of the healthful aspects of riding in an open car, top down, and are purchasing open models as auxiliary vehicles.

During April, so pronounced is the favor enjoyed by the Overland touring model, it is expected that the total output and retail sales in this type alone will mount into the 6000 mark and plans to meet this demand are being made at the factory and by the dealer organizations throughout the country.

Along the scenic highways of the country it is not an unusual sight to read a sign saying, "A better view may be had by driving with the top down." It is not amiss to assume that the highway commissioners are instrumental in bringing an entirely new element of buying demand as it relates to the type of car which is enjoying seasonal popularity this spring.

WOMAN ADVOCATES ENTRY INTO LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)
ST. LOUIS, Mo., April 20. — Immediate entrance of the United States into the League of Nations was strongly advocated before delegates to the seventh annual convention of the League of Women Voters by Mrs. I. W. Harrison, Lexington, Ky., delegate here today.

"If we are not ready now to take our seat in the vacant chair awaiting us at the League's council table," Mrs. Harrison declared, "at least we can work with it in its best efforts to eradicate evils and remove perils that have no respect for the national boundaries."

HEARING SCHEDULED ON FARM RELIEF BILLS.

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)
WASHINGTON, April 20. — The House agriculture committee decided today to give the house an opportunity to vote on both the Livestock and Trencher farm relief bills.

Despite the decision of this policy, the committee today agreed to re-open hearings tomorrow night, giving opponents of the

CHAPTER 33

Persistence.
With sudden panic it occurred to me that mother might ask me to show father the diamonds. Suppose she did? I would have to say what I had done. She would meddle. I wanted to keep it from her until I had definitely convinced Addison that I would never marry him. If mother took a hand—? I began to regret the return.

I would have to forestall her move. I tapped the window, told the chauffeur to drive more quickly. Janice would help me. No one saw me entering the house. I threw off my cloak quickly, went to her.

"What do you want to do me a favor?" I asked simply.
"I'm so pleased, Gail, and so proud," she answered happily. "Of course I will."

"Well, I don't want father or Uncle Lorin to know about the necklace or anything. You can say mother to say nothing for a few days, will you?"

A puzzled, round-eyed frown raised her ample brows, but she promised.
Rupert Addison wrote: "My dearest Gail: I know now why you were angry that I kissed you. At first I was hurt and ashamed. But I have thought it all over and I realize you are so young, so very sweet, my love surprised and startled you. I thought you guessed it. I have told you in so many ways, but I should have understood. Gail—how I love that name—it is so nice since I have thought of any girl I have grown clumsy. You will have to teach me all over again."

"There is another thing, too, I want to explain. You think I have a poor idea of women. As my wife—dear and only girl—you will never find this in the case. No position will be too high for the woman I honor with my name. Of course, you will be an inspiration and can you avoid being a beautiful background? But I will not hamper you in any way. You will be the queen of my home—your lightest wish a matter of grave import."

"I want you to know, that I believe thoroughly in the independence of the wife and mother. I will see that your income is adequate to the dignity of your station, adequate for your every whim, my dear. There will never be any difficulties between us over money matters."

It caused me no pain to refuse him, for I did not feel the vitality in him, so I could not visualize his suffering. I sat down at once and answered, perhaps with too cold a formality:

"Dear Mr. Addison:
"Your letter is frank. I appreciate deeply its sentiment and thank you for the honor of your offer. I realize fully its import and the dignity of the position you have outlined."

"It is with regret that I tell you again I can not be your wife. I do not love you and I do not wish to marry you. No material consideration will ever change exactly what I am doing. Kings could not tempt me. I have returned your gift. This is final. If you have any regard for me, you will accept it."

"Very cordially yours,
"GAIL SHERMAN."

I kept a copy of that letter. It seems callous to me now—needlessly curt. On the back of the rough copy are many lines scratched out, revised. One I pondered about was this:

"You are mistaken as to my anger, Mr. Addison. I assure you I can neither so young nor so sweet that a kiss is the slightest surprise to me. I was indignant only because you took what my feelings are not willing to yield you."

Toward the end of the week Janice came in as I ate breakfast. She tried to do this, for her was a warm, friendly personality, delighting in the intimacy of toast, coffee, crisp strips of bacon and leisurely gossip. We had just begun to talk when the maid knocked, handing my aunt a small package. She looked at it, her large, amiable face taking on a girlish frown.

"From him?" she said, with her arch, eager look. "Now you will tell us what he has said, Gail, your father leaves tomorrow, and I know your mother cannot keep the secret any longer. She said so. She doesn't think it right. You know Rupert is backing him. Open it! Dear, I believe I am younger than you, Gail!"

The blood came in a stinging rush to my face and neck. I would have to tell her now. "What can it be?" she said. "Another surprise!"

"It is the necklace, Janice," I said, opening the box in a grim surge of hatred for Rupert Addison and his attentions.

Janice gasped, her features lost in a round, astonished stare. "The necklace!" she gasped, breathlessly.

"Yes, I returned it. I am not going to marry Rupert Addison. I have refused him."

"The stare widened until her face looked like a blond, vacant circle. "Refused Rupert, Gail? And he has sent it again?"

She sat back smoothing the ringlets from her soft, white neck. "He has sent it again?"

"Yes," she drew a deep breath. "Well!" Finally she smiled. "I guess that means he is going to win you, Gail."

I said nothing. Gradually her face, its pleasant man to take Rupert is not the man to take 'no' when he wants 'yes'. He doesn't now defeat, Gail. Ask Uncle Lorin about him. He is a man in a thousand. Wait until you know him, dear. I have watched him for fourteen years."

"I don't want him, Janice," I cried in a passion of scorn. "I'd rather die than marry him! It gives me the chills to—think about him!"

"Because of that other affair, Gail," she said gently. "You are prejudiced. But you must think of that, dear. Rupert is so different. He seldom drinks. He is the man for you."

"I wish I had never met him!" I said childishly, resenting my aunt, fearful of my mother. "Are you going to tell mother, Janice?"

"She ought to know." "She will try to browbeat me," Janice smiled. "That is like youth, dear. Once I thought my mother was browbeating me. I've blessed her ever since for her judgment."

"You wouldn't think much of that judgment, Janice, if you saw Dal Warren the night of his wedding; if you saw him chasing Marlan all over the house! Mother knew he was so drunk he nearly committed murder, but she made Marlan go away with him!"

Janice frowned, a pained color suffusing her amiable face. This was news to her.

"I would not have you forced, Gail," she said slowly, "for you have sense, and I know you will come to care for Rupert if you give him a chance. Promise not to be hasty; keep the necklace awhile. I will say nothing about it."

But I know my mother said something to father. As he left the next day he caught my chin in his hand and pinched it, laughed and kissed me as much as to say: "Well, you're the daughter of your father—clever enough!"

I found myself praying that something would detain Rupert Addison. I even pictured him in automobile and train accidents. I didn't care what kept him, so long as I escaped without the sordid misery of more quarreling.

For once in my life the unlooked-for did intervene. A telegram came. It was for mother. Her face slowly blanched as she read it. She drew her breath hard, pulling in her lips, biting them.

"From Marlan," she said, her eyes distended. She offered it to me, her hands shaking. It said: "Come quickly! Marlan very ill!"

"DAL WARREN." Mother looked about helplessly, rushed over to the wall and rang furiously. Two maids responded to the frantic summons. Janice came in.

"Pack my grip," mother said, her lips trembling. "Janice read the message." "What time is the next train?" mother asked.

"You can leave at 2," I answered. "You will not go!" Janice exclaimed. Mother glanced at me in bewilderment.

"I certainly will go!" I cried. "Marlan may die!" I ran from the room, began throwing my things in a suitcase, hurrying orders at the maid who helped me. Half an hour later mother came in.

"Thank God, dear," she said fervently. "Look at this!" It was another wire—this one from father. "Don't be alarmed," it said. "Marlan improving. Let Gail stay West."
