MAYOR'S RADIO SET
DESTROYED BY FIRE.

The fire department was called this morning to the home of Mayor George E. Houck, to quell a conflagration in his honor's super-heterodyne radio set. After taking his morning's setting up exercises, via some station or another, Mayor Houck apparently did not properly disconnect the machine, for in a little while Mrs. Houck found the set blazing quite merrily and threatening to set fire to the entire house. She immediately called the fire department, over the club phone, asking help in handling the situation and a quick run was made, although no alarm was sounded. The fire, however, burned itself out without doing any damage outside of the radio set.

Let us give you an estimate on that material bill. L. W. Metzger.

CHAPTER 39
Beggars and Kings.

"So you came, Miss Sherman?" That was all Grant Benders had a chance to say before the speaker was on the platform.

"Well, I seem to be here," I answered, feeling light hearted, carefree.

He took the chair next mine, folded his arms, his face smoothing into his attitude of remote, ever-serious detachment. He seemed to pay no attention to me.

"I suppose it was all old to him, but I listened in a glow of terror. The speaker said the evening star poised serene like a young spirit just above it.

"We don't often see that," he said, pointing to it.

I waited till he was gone, closed
my eyes, and felt the steady feeling rather chilled and empty. There was a telegram on my dresser. It was from my father—only a few words:

"Please be home in the morning at 11:30. I wish to see you."
FATHER.

I would have to face a siege with him!

What was my father going to do?

I will see father. I decided.
"I will tell him calmly that I am not going to yield. He will see the futility of tormenting me."

All through the night I was conscious of rehearsing these interviews, half waking with a sick fear creeping warmly round and round my heart, then turning angrily, saying aloud: "What can he do in the end? I will win."

It was late when I awakened.
My father was very sensitive to the personal appearance of mother and of me.

Almost at the minute of 11:30 Rosalee knocked.

"Your mother wishes you to go to Mr. Sherman's library," she said.

Is father there, Rosalee? I asked.

She lowered her head. "That's all I am to say, Miss Gail," she answered in tones most affectionately. "Mrs. Sherman wants you to come at once."

I hadn't seen mother since the moment she had left the room with that threatening ultimatum.
Was she to be present?

The door of my father's library was half ajar. No murmur reached me. He was alone. I walked quickly, stopped on the threshold with a shock of baffled surprise.

"Ah, Gail!" Rupert Addison stood in the room, towered there, his face darkly flushed, his lips parted. He came toward me, his hands extended, saying in a low, avid tone, "My dear girl!"

I stood rigid, staring at him.
He reached for my hands, drew ter of luck whether we land on a good doorstep or a bad one. One turns out a queen and the other a beggar."

Keith Howard had a store of incidents to illustrate every point he made. Now it was some man he had met in the coal mines, never the superintendent of a great factory who had been twice in a reform school before he was ten, now a convict who might have been a statesman if the right chance had been taken at the right moment.

"It's late, Jean," I said, nervous fear shooting through me. I wondered if mother had missed me: "I must go!"

Dr. Benders stood up. He had paid no attention to either Jean or me as he talked, growing impatient when we wandered into the glittering bypaths, picturing ourselves as queens, now hoboes.

"I'll drive with you, if you like, Miss Sherman," he said in his different, remote tone.

"You will have a long distance to get back."

"I can stand the exercise if you can stand the company."

"Well—come then—right away.
I'll be glad. I'm really a bit afraid wandering around the city at this time of night."

We drove silently. It was a clear, brilliant night with the moon a silver crescent and the evening star poised serene like a young spirit just above it.

"We don't often see that," he
said, pointing to it.

I waited till he was gone, closed
my eyes, and felt the steady
feeling rather chilled and me into the room, his eyes glowing with a gleam of triumph. "Look up at me," he said. "I'll tell you how you are—how happy you are."

I took my hands from his moist clasp, leaned against my father's desk. "Didn't you get my telegram, Mr. Addison?"

"Oh, yes, I did answer! I thought you would tell me."

"Did you get it?" My voice rasped. I was so unnerved, so startled, by this unexpected intrigue.

"No, dear. But that's all right.
I understand. I thought you were perhaps too overcome. You wanted to wait till you could tell me."

I flung my hands in an impatient gesture at him. "What can you mean, Mr. Addison?" I asked holy.

"I was to meet my father here. Did he send you instead?"

"He told me you would see me, Gail. Why, dear—my dear girl," he came over, put his arm across my shoulder, looked down at me.
"You wanted to see me, didn't you?"

"I sent you a message, Mr.
Addison."

"Hush, you mean." He was patting my shoulder. I tried to spring from him, but he clasped his arms about me, his eyes smiling in a patronizing kindness. "I didn't get any wire from you," he said. "Look up now and give me your message."

"Please let me go—let me go!" I felt that I would faint or begin to cry with his hands rubbing my shoulders. I couldn't control my voice enough to speak.

I moved from him, scarcely able to keep the emotion from my face. He swung his arms around my waist, bending his head until his lips rested on my hair:

"Oh, don't! There isn't any use, Mr. Addison. Please believe it."

"Let me go, please let me go.
I haven't changed. I don't love you!"

"Will you kiss me goodbye?"
I could feel his eyes though I didn't look at him. Chill shudders trembled through me. "I can't," Mr. Addison. He dropped my hand—washed into the hall. The front door closed with a sharp snap.

I ran from the room, rushed up the stairs, intending to go out at once. At the landing I plunged headlong against my mother.
She moved back, her face erect, pursed me without a word.

Was that the way they would take it?
