WITH THE AUTO TOURISTS AT THE CAMP GROUNDS

"I have been in every state in the Union, but this is my first trip into Oregon and I must say that the people here are the most congenial that I have ever met anywhere," said R. E. Richards of Los Angeles. He was accompanied by his wife and son and the party is on the way to Vancouver, B. C.

A tourist party consisting of Norman Rockwell, Ed Souters, S.H. McDonough and C. W. Hosmer experienced their first accident since leaving Detroit as they were near the Oregon line. They were traveling upon the Redwood Highway and were thrown against the bank by a speeding car, but all that was necessary to restore things in order was to right the "Lizzie" and untangle themselves from the jumble of camping equipment and humanity. The highly decorated car, equipped with everything up to locomotive bells and ship lights, has carried the party from Detroit, around the rim of the United States, and is now headed home through Yellowstone Park.

THRILL HUNTERS

By W. L. FRED VAN DUZER

CHAPTER 5. Clare had captured the town's prize peep for the afternoon. Gr. rather her mother had captured him for her. Why couldn't Satterly have telephoned her direct; asked if she wished to drive with him?

It looked as if her debut were not going to make much difference; as if she would not be a person in her own right after all, but merely "Amy Dean's daughter," with folks discussing her right over her head, or ignoring her entirely!

Perhaps Satterly had asked Amy to drive. Perhaps he'd asked Amy first, and she'd slipped her daughter in. . . what an idea! Funny she never felt that way about her mother before last night!

She couldn't love Amy if I were anyone of her kind, she told herself, ashamed. "And I do love her. She's kind of—kind of different from most women, but she's been a good mother. And she's so beautiful and brilliant. No one could help loving her!"

Clare dressed for outdoors before lunch. In a little brown velvet skirt and jacket, furred at the collar and wrists, and crushed a brown felt hat down over her ears. She looked rather like a small, brown bird, a pert sparrow, excepting that her cheeks were so red and her eyes so brightly blue.

Amy came to the luncheon table in a languid mood, trailing the befringed draperies of a yellow teagown. She had slicked back her hair in a French twist and long rings dangled from her ears. Word came from the hospital that Dr. Paul still was in the operating room, and "Doc" seldom appeared for the noon meal.

"You're not going out, Amy?" "Where can you go in this town? Val's giving a tea at the hotel, but you know how Paul feels about my going there. 'Nice' women are too dignified to dance in a public restaurant," she mimicked. "Oh Lord! Who cares for dignity?"

"Really, Mother? I sort of thought. . . Ted said—"

"Ted! He's as bad as his brother. Ted's a he-prude. Pay no attention to Ted if you want to get anywhere. He's back in eighteen-sixty, when men wanted women to do the cooking and have a baby every year or so. Don't you believe it!"

"What do they want of their wives now, Amy?" "Gayety, of course! Men with money—and they're the only ones for you to bother about—want women who will flatter them and amuse them and look like a million dollars sitting at a restaurant table. They want women up and doing and in for anything at a moment's notice."

"But if they've children—"

"Oh, don't be foolish. Women are worth a thing or two!" Clare rushed to her room when she heard Satterly's voice in the hall. A little more powder on her tilted nose; a final crushing down of the brown hat. . .

When she came to the library, Amy was reclining picturesquely in a big chair, smiling up at Satterly, who was bending over her with his arm on the cushion. Clare entered noiselessly; paused inside the door with the sense of bewilderment that had assailed her at the party last night.

What was it she didn't understand? The look in his eyes as he stood there—what did it mean? She'd seen it before, when Amy was like that, all flushed and smiling and so alive. Now he was bending lower, slipping his arm along the cushion.

She moved, and Satterly looked up suddenly. Then he came forward and took her hand rather pointedly neglecting Amy as they went out to his car, parked in the drive.

"Only steel and glass and rubber," he said softly. "But I wish it were a milk-white steed for my brown little girl. What a lovely little thing you are!" He caught her up and held her a minute before placing her, reluctantly, on the seat.

"There was a fur rug to be tucked over her lap; he gathered her hands to see that they were warm. And finally he climbed into the driver's seat and started the engine.

They drove through the town and out into the country and Satterly's caressing, oft-repeated "Princess, no less than his manner of behaving as if she were indeed a princess found Clare fast in a web of enchantment.

A little faintly, a little gray, a tiny bit lined about the eyes, he nevertheless was Prince Charming, bringing to her a dream of love!

It was dusk when they turned homeward on the country road. She snuggled under the rug, silent and rather depressed, because the ride was nearly over. Then Satterly touched the driving-board and a funnel of light moved before them; far ahead it picked out a small car parked at the edge of a lane that ran to an old, deserted farm house.

A man got out of the car and stood facing them, with the light full on his face. Clare recognized him with a start of apprehension. The fruit peddler!

When they swept past the lane she saw that the car was one of Dr. Paul's. And Amy was at the wheel. Copyright 1926—King Features Syndicate, Inc.

Did you ever follow a hunch? It's a pretty good idea. Sutherland Valley has something to offer.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC

In justice to the public and to myself and associates, who are drilling for oil or gas near Sutherland, I beg to say to all that neither myself nor my associates have any connection with any campaign for the selling of Sutherland real estate. We have no interest in any such campaign or in the property advertised or in the proceeds of sale, and know nothing about the movement until we saw the printed advertisement.

Movie Sidelights

A camera-proof face has been discovered. The face belongs to Kenneth Thomson, young leading man of the stage, who is acting his first role before the camera, and the honors of discovery are claimed by Cecil B. DeMille.

Chief in the screen technique is the art of withholding objectionable face-angles from the camera. DeMille discovered in camera tests that Thomson has no objectionable face-angles. As a result the usual apprenticeship to the screen was cancelled.

Cinema stars usually take vacations when they finish a picture, but not so with Lois Wilson when she completed work in "The Show Off." The very next morning she reported for her role in "The Great Gatsby." The part called for bobbed hair and since Miss Wilson had never before had her locks short, a camera clicked away as the barber operated so that a permanent record might be kept of the event.

Life-long golfers, who yet are on friendly terms with the century mark in their scoring, will find their molars when they hear that Priscilla Dean became a professional golf instructor in a half dozen seasons.

The motion picture actress was to star in a film in which she appears as a golf professional. Since her knowledge of the game didn't extend to the difference between a mashie and niblick, she engaged a corps of instructors and "cramped" for the motion picture filming.

The result was a success which defied the camera. The instructor professionals breathed more freely, however, when they were assured that the cards she turned in wouldn't have to be shown in the picture.

Noah Beery has joined Ricardo Cortez, William Powell, Adolphe Menjou and Warner Baxter in wearing hair as an ornament to the face. His role in a First National picture called for a real beard and it took only a short time to prove he could grow one.

The latest decree of fashion is that combined garments worn by smart women must not exceed 20 ounces. Constance Talmadge then she must be ultra-smart, for she is wearing only sixteen ounces of clothes. A late acquisition is a slip-on frock for day and evening wear which she can don in twenty seconds.

Do you know that Sutherland has a claim to become the largest city in Southern Oregon?

TRAIN STOPS TO LET CAL PURCHASE SOME TOOTH WASH

(Associated Press Leased Wire.) ON BOARD PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S SPECIAL TRAIN, July 7.—President and Mrs. Coolidge were in New York today bound for a vacation in the north woods.

Leaving Washington late yesterday afternoon, the train of eight Pullmans passed through Baltimore, Md., and Philadelphia, to the outskirts of New York before swinging to the west shore of the Hudson river.

Accompanying the president were Secretary Everett Sanders, military and naval attaches and a number of officers and household employees as well as secret service men. All enjoyed entering a cool weather zone last night, after an oppressive day of heat and humidity in Washington, while they looked forward to even lower temperatures in the north woods.

rumors of illness spread when the train halted for a few minutes at West Philadelphia for medicine, but it was only for a tooth wash and a change of clothes.

Later officials and officers making up the official party, witnessed a film in the president's private car. Adding to the vacation touch was the presence of two white collars, Rob Roy and Prudence Prim, while Mrs. Coolidge brought along four canaries in a cage from the White House.

The president and Mrs. Coolidge are expected to spend their first day in White Pine camp getting settled. The summer executive offices will be established at Paul Smith's Hotel four miles from the camp.
