

A General ALL-ROUND

Hand Sprayer

is the Brown all brass. A Sprayer that throws an up spray as well as one straight ahead. Call and get one, and also look at the "Brown Dust Sprayer." Just what is needed for dry spraying. Save your animals by using Sherwin Williams Fly Spray in a Brown sprayer. More milk, more flesh, contentment.

Churchill Hardware Co.

"Winchester Store."

THRILL HUNTERS

By WINIFRED VAN DUZER

CHAPTER 18.

"Do you mean Mr. Bond, Maggie? Is he a sealawag? You know something about him, then?"

"And who don't? Though I'll not be dirty'll the sweet, pretty ears of you with the likes of him."

"But Maggie dear, you must tell me. Mother doesn't know if he isn't nice."

"Don't she, now?" Maggie remarked, rubbing her nose, "I don't really, however, she began a wandering recital of rocking notoriety. The aged and wealthy Cappy Bond had piled one social obscenity upon another until his very name was a byword. Dark deeds were hinted."

"He's a bad egg, that one," the housemaid finished.

Clare had comprehended only some of the story; enough to keep her watching at the window for her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

"Why, he's a wicked person, Amy! He's been divorced over and over and has done terrible things. When his last wife sued him he sued her back, or something, and named his own son correspondent! Everybody knows about him."

"I don't see such a busy-body. I guess when a man has millions, he can be allowed his eccentricities. . . . Give me that hand mirror, will you? Heavens, I look positively old! Now forget it, Clare. I've just got out from under one thumb and I'm not likely to jump back under yours."

Even in her anger Amy was charming, magnificent almost. Clare thought of her mother's life frittered away on trivial things and felt a quick rush of pity and love.

She said, impulsively, "Why don't you train your voice some more? You could sing in concert, even on the stage perhaps—now. You're so wonderful! Truly, truly you are! You'd take everybody by storm. You're an artist at heart, dear; sometimes I think that's why you're so restless and all."

"Well . . . Maybe I would be happier. It's what I've always wanted. Goodness knows I'm discontented enough now! With something to do. . . . Funny I didn't think of it myself. I'll go tomorrow."

But the next day Val Hanton came. She burst in yipping "Hooryay!" and thrust herself at Amy. "No visit this time. I'm here to stay. Snook the dust of Athens off my commission, for good and all, old friends!"

Mrs. Dean asked, "What's happened to friend husband?" and Clare politely withdrew to her own room. But Val's chatter came to her distinctly.

"You know what sort of stunt of parking your car over at the depot and hiring a taxi to take you wherever you like for as long as you like?"

"My dear, I was so cautious! But the bills did run up—there's a perfectly adorable new man in the city, darling—and I pinched all I dared from the household allowance and even had my dressmaker add something extra to the bill, to give back to me, of course."

"And the boy?"

"Oh, he stays with his father. I'm sorry about that. But he's better off than he'd be with me. I don't suppose I've been much of a mother. We're not cut out for motherhood, I guess, women like you and me."

Clare strained her ears, but Val was talking of the city and the boy.

Clare felt that her mother was rather ashamed of having a daughter who dated her years so early, and she began to wonder how to her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

"Why, he's a wicked person, Amy! He's been divorced over and over and has done terrible things. When his last wife sued him he sued her back, or something, and named his own son correspondent! Everybody knows about him."

"I don't see such a busy-body. I guess when a man has millions, he can be allowed his eccentricities. . . . Give me that hand mirror, will you? Heavens, I look positively old! Now forget it, Clare. I've just got out from under one thumb and I'm not likely to jump back under yours."

Even in her anger Amy was charming, magnificent almost. Clare thought of her mother's life frittered away on trivial things and felt a quick rush of pity and love.

She said, impulsively, "Why don't you train your voice some more? You could sing in concert, even on the stage perhaps—now. You're so wonderful! Truly, truly you are! You'd take everybody by storm. You're an artist at heart, dear; sometimes I think that's why you're so restless and all."

"Well . . . Maybe I would be happier. It's what I've always wanted. Goodness knows I'm discontented enough now! With something to do. . . . Funny I didn't think of it myself. I'll go tomorrow."

But the next day Val Hanton came. She burst in yipping "Hooryay!" and thrust herself at Amy. "No visit this time. I'm here to stay. Snook the dust of Athens off my commission, for good and all, old friends!"

Mrs. Dean asked, "What's happened to friend husband?" and Clare politely withdrew to her own room. But Val's chatter came to her distinctly.

"You know what sort of stunt of parking your car over at the depot and hiring a taxi to take you wherever you like for as long as you like?"

"My dear, I was so cautious! But the bills did run up—there's a perfectly adorable new man in the city, darling—and I pinched all I dared from the household allowance and even had my dressmaker add something extra to the bill, to give back to me, of course."

"And the boy?"

"Oh, he stays with his father. I'm sorry about that. But he's better off than he'd be with me. I don't suppose I've been much of a mother. We're not cut out for motherhood, I guess, women like you and me."

Clare strained her ears, but Val was talking of the city and the boy.

Clare felt that her mother was rather ashamed of having a daughter who dated her years so early, and she began to wonder how to her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

"Why, he's a wicked person, Amy! He's been divorced over and over and has done terrible things. When his last wife sued him he sued her back, or something, and named his own son correspondent! Everybody knows about him."

"I don't see such a busy-body. I guess when a man has millions, he can be allowed his eccentricities. . . . Give me that hand mirror, will you? Heavens, I look positively old! Now forget it, Clare. I've just got out from under one thumb and I'm not likely to jump back under yours."

Even in her anger Amy was charming, magnificent almost. Clare thought of her mother's life frittered away on trivial things and felt a quick rush of pity and love.

She said, impulsively, "Why don't you train your voice some more? You could sing in concert, even on the stage perhaps—now. You're so wonderful! Truly, truly you are! You'd take everybody by storm. You're an artist at heart, dear; sometimes I think that's why you're so restless and all."

"Well . . . Maybe I would be happier. It's what I've always wanted. Goodness knows I'm discontented enough now! With something to do. . . . Funny I didn't think of it myself. I'll go tomorrow."

But the next day Val Hanton came. She burst in yipping "Hooryay!" and thrust herself at Amy. "No visit this time. I'm here to stay. Snook the dust of Athens off my commission, for good and all, old friends!"

Mrs. Dean asked, "What's happened to friend husband?" and Clare politely withdrew to her own room. But Val's chatter came to her distinctly.

"You know what sort of stunt of parking your car over at the depot and hiring a taxi to take you wherever you like for as long as you like?"

"My dear, I was so cautious! But the bills did run up—there's a perfectly adorable new man in the city, darling—and I pinched all I dared from the household allowance and even had my dressmaker add something extra to the bill, to give back to me, of course."

"And the boy?"

"Oh, he stays with his father. I'm sorry about that. But he's better off than he'd be with me. I don't suppose I've been much of a mother. We're not cut out for motherhood, I guess, women like you and me."

Clare strained her ears, but Val was talking of the city and the boy.

Clare felt that her mother was rather ashamed of having a daughter who dated her years so early, and she began to wonder how to her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

failed to catch Amy's answer. Val settled down in a small apartment on the same floor and there began a hectic intimacy between her and Amy. Together they employed a beauty specialist and spent their mornings in one or the other's boudoir being shampooed, clay-packed, massaged and manicured.

Afternoons they fared forth to a matinee or tea-dance, and came back giggling like school girls. And when they remained at home in the evening it was not from choice.

Clare felt that her mother was rather ashamed of having a daughter who dated her years so early, and she began to wonder how to her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

"Why, he's a wicked person, Amy! He's been divorced over and over and has done terrible things. When his last wife sued him he sued her back, or something, and named his own son correspondent! Everybody knows about him."

"I don't see such a busy-body. I guess when a man has millions, he can be allowed his eccentricities. . . . Give me that hand mirror, will you? Heavens, I look positively old! Now forget it, Clare. I've just got out from under one thumb and I'm not likely to jump back under yours."

Even in her anger Amy was charming, magnificent almost. Clare thought of her mother's life frittered away on trivial things and felt a quick rush of pity and love.

She said, impulsively, "Why don't you train your voice some more? You could sing in concert, even on the stage perhaps—now. You're so wonderful! Truly, truly you are! You'd take everybody by storm. You're an artist at heart, dear; sometimes I think that's why you're so restless and all."

"Well . . . Maybe I would be happier. It's what I've always wanted. Goodness knows I'm discontented enough now! With something to do. . . . Funny I didn't think of it myself. I'll go tomorrow."

But the next day Val Hanton came. She burst in yipping "Hooryay!" and thrust herself at Amy. "No visit this time. I'm here to stay. Snook the dust of Athens off my commission, for good and all, old friends!"

Mrs. Dean asked, "What's happened to friend husband?" and Clare politely withdrew to her own room. But Val's chatter came to her distinctly.

"You know what sort of stunt of parking your car over at the depot and hiring a taxi to take you wherever you like for as long as you like?"

"My dear, I was so cautious! But the bills did run up—there's a perfectly adorable new man in the city, darling—and I pinched all I dared from the household allowance and even had my dressmaker add something extra to the bill, to give back to me, of course."

"And the boy?"

"Oh, he stays with his father. I'm sorry about that. But he's better off than he'd be with me. I don't suppose I've been much of a mother. We're not cut out for motherhood, I guess, women like you and me."

Clare strained her ears, but Val was talking of the city and the boy.

Clare felt that her mother was rather ashamed of having a daughter who dated her years so early, and she began to wonder how to her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

"Why, he's a wicked person, Amy! He's been divorced over and over and has done terrible things. When his last wife sued him he sued her back, or something, and named his own son correspondent! Everybody knows about him."

"I don't see such a busy-body. I guess when a man has millions, he can be allowed his eccentricities. . . . Give me that hand mirror, will you? Heavens, I look positively old! Now forget it, Clare. I've just got out from under one thumb and I'm not likely to jump back under yours."

Even in her anger Amy was charming, magnificent almost. Clare thought of her mother's life frittered away on trivial things and felt a quick rush of pity and love.

She said, impulsively, "Why don't you train your voice some more? You could sing in concert, even on the stage perhaps—now. You're so wonderful! Truly, truly you are! You'd take everybody by storm. You're an artist at heart, dear; sometimes I think that's why you're so restless and all."

"Well . . . Maybe I would be happier. It's what I've always wanted. Goodness knows I'm discontented enough now! With something to do. . . . Funny I didn't think of it myself. I'll go tomorrow."

But the next day Val Hanton came. She burst in yipping "Hooryay!" and thrust herself at Amy. "No visit this time. I'm here to stay. Snook the dust of Athens off my commission, for good and all, old friends!"

Mrs. Dean asked, "What's happened to friend husband?" and Clare politely withdrew to her own room. But Val's chatter came to her distinctly.

"You know what sort of stunt of parking your car over at the depot and hiring a taxi to take you wherever you like for as long as you like?"

"My dear, I was so cautious! But the bills did run up—there's a perfectly adorable new man in the city, darling—and I pinched all I dared from the household allowance and even had my dressmaker add something extra to the bill, to give back to me, of course."

"And the boy?"

"Oh, he stays with his father. I'm sorry about that. But he's better off than he'd be with me. I don't suppose I've been much of a mother. We're not cut out for motherhood, I guess, women like you and me."

Clare strained her ears, but Val was talking of the city and the boy.

Clare felt that her mother was rather ashamed of having a daughter who dated her years so early, and she began to wonder how to her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

"Why, he's a wicked person, Amy! He's been divorced over and over and has done terrible things. When his last wife sued him he sued her back, or something, and named his own son correspondent! Everybody knows about him."

"I don't see such a busy-body. I guess when a man has millions, he can be allowed his eccentricities. . . . Give me that hand mirror, will you? Heavens, I look positively old! Now forget it, Clare. I've just got out from under one thumb and I'm not likely to jump back under yours."

Even in her anger Amy was charming, magnificent almost. Clare thought of her mother's life frittered away on trivial things and felt a quick rush of pity and love.

She said, impulsively, "Why don't you train your voice some more? You could sing in concert, even on the stage perhaps—now. You're so wonderful! Truly, truly you are! You'd take everybody by storm. You're an artist at heart, dear; sometimes I think that's why you're so restless and all."

"Well . . . Maybe I would be happier. It's what I've always wanted. Goodness knows I'm discontented enough now! With something to do. . . . Funny I didn't think of it myself. I'll go tomorrow."

But the next day Val Hanton came. She burst in yipping "Hooryay!" and thrust herself at Amy. "No visit this time. I'm here to stay. Snook the dust of Athens off my commission, for good and all, old friends!"

Mrs. Dean asked, "What's happened to friend husband?" and Clare politely withdrew to her own room. But Val's chatter came to her distinctly.

"You know what sort of stunt of parking your car over at the depot and hiring a taxi to take you wherever you like for as long as you like?"

"My dear, I was so cautious! But the bills did run up—there's a perfectly adorable new man in the city, darling—and I pinched all I dared from the household allowance and even had my dressmaker add something extra to the bill, to give back to me, of course."

"And the boy?"

"Oh, he stays with his father. I'm sorry about that. But he's better off than he'd be with me. I don't suppose I've been much of a mother. We're not cut out for motherhood, I guess, women like you and me."

Clare strained her ears, but Val was talking of the city and the boy.

Clare felt that her mother was rather ashamed of having a daughter who dated her years so early, and she began to wonder how to her mother's return. It was early but Amy was ill-tempered with fatigue.

"Perfectly rotten evening," she complained. "Deliver me from old dodos with a gay-life complex!"

Yet when Clare begged her never again to see this particular old dodo, her eyes were hard.

"And why shouldn't I see him?" she demanded.

"Why, he's a wicked person, Amy! He's been divorced over and over and has done terrible things. When his last wife sued him he sued her back, or something, and named his own son correspondent! Everybody knows about him."

"I don't see such a busy-body. I guess when a man has millions, he can be allowed his eccentricities. . . . Give me that hand mirror, will you? Heavens, I look positively old! Now forget it, Clare. I've just got out from under one thumb and I'm not likely to jump back under yours."

Even in her anger Amy was charming, magnificent almost. Clare thought of her mother's life frittered away on trivial things and felt a quick rush of pity and love.

She said, impulsively, "Why don't you train your voice some more? You could sing in concert, even on the stage perhaps—now. You're so wonderful! Truly, truly you are! You'd take everybody by storm. You're an artist at heart, dear; sometimes I think that's why you're so restless and all."

MOVIE NOTES

MAJESTIC THEATRE

Majestic To Show "Radio Detective."

Those who saw the first installment of "The Radio Detective," Arthur H. Reeves' new serial, which was produced in cooperation and endorsed by the Boy Scouts of America, at the Majestic last week, will be anxious to see what happened to Evans. The next installment will be shown tonight and Friday and Saturday at the Majestic. There will be another Family Night tonight. The whole family will be admitted for the price of one ticket, twenty-five cents.

Playing the role of Easton Evans, a youthful Hercules and electrical genius, Jack Daugherty is the point of interest in a thrilling football game between Rockledge and Sheffield Colleges, in which the victory is won for his school by virtue of his great power. In "The Radio Detective" the screen adaptation of the story by Arthur H. Reeves, a ten episode Adventure Picture, Daugherty is said to play the most startling part he has ever essayed, for in this story he is the trial and convict of the world famous scientific detective, Craig Kennedy, known to millions who have read the stories by the noted author.

Copyright 1926—King Features Syndicate, Inc.

CHICAGO PRIMARY INVESTIGATION IS ORDERED BY COURT

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

CHICAGO, July 22.—A complete recount of the vote cast in Cook county (Chicago) for the United States senatorial nomination in both Republican and Democratic parties was ordered today by County Judge Jacoby, at the request of Senator James A. Reed of Missouri, chairman of the senate campaign expenditures committee.

The court acted as true bills, reported to have been voted against 51 judges and clerks of election in the April primaries, were awaited in the criminal court.

Senator Reed sought the aid of the county court in determining how the senatorial ballots were handled as his committee prepared to assemble here Monday for an inquiry into the senatorial primaries.

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

LA GRANDE, Ore., July 22.—With more than 300 real estate men of the Pacific northwest in La Grande this morning, the tenth annual convention formally opened when W. A. Deland, representing Governor Walter M. Pierce of Idaho, president of the city commission, and William Miller, president of the La Grande realty board, officially welcomed the visiting delegates.

A. H. Barnhill, president of the northwest association, responded to the addresses of welcome and later delivered his annual report which was followed by the report of T. W. Zimmerman, secretary, and state vice presidents.

William E. Herren, director of extension, national association of real estate boards, arrived here from Waterloo, Iowa, this morning, representing the national association.

MEMBER OF PIONEER FAMILY DIES SUDDENLY.

Word has been received here of the sudden death at Lovelock, Nevada, of Mrs. Rose M. Whybark, wife of W. H. Whybark. Mrs. Whybark will be remembered by many of the older residents as the daughter of C. C. and Sarah McClelland, early pioneers of Benton County, who settled in early days on the North Umpqua river at Roseburg. Mrs. Whybark was a cousin of Mrs. H. Hinkle of Roseburg. She is survived by a husband and a son, as well as several brothers and sisters.

LIBERTY THEATRE

Tripping on the light fantastic toe; or the mad and tear Charleston steps enacted by some bohemian divinity, is evidenced in seventy-five per cent of the motion picture shown regularly today. Bernard MacFadden's second True story picture, "Wives At Auction," with Gaston Glass and Edna Murphy, although unlike in theme and weaving of the story, nevertheless contains a scene which shows a dance in progress and a vivacious and elusive young lady, recruited from one of Broadway's musical shows, enacting some of the most artistic Charleston steps that have been filmed in a long time.

It is a humanly told picture with its sincere touches, and will reach the screen of the Liberty Theatre today.

POINCARÉ WILL HEAD MINISTRY; FRANC ADVANCES

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

PARIS, July 22.—The French franc advanced nearly two points better than yesterday's closing quotation on the prospects of a Poincaré ministry and remained firm during the morning, notwithstanding the fact that the Bank of France statement showed that the government had borrowed 500,000,000 francs.

The increase in the bank's advances was discounted yesterday when Finance Minister De Monzie asked parliament quickly to pass the measure authorizing the sale of the remaining portion of the Morgan loan for the use of the treasury.

The selection of M. Poincaré to form a government brought an entirely new feeling among the people of all walks of life. Even those who regarded the choice as not the best that could be made politically, hailed it with satisfaction as a guarantee that there would be no more political maneuvering around the financial question.

In financial circles that was regarded as the most potent factor in the market today.

622 is the phone No. of the Hotel Rose barber and beauty parlor. Shampoo 50c, marcel $1. Phone for appointment.

NEWSY BITS

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

PRINCE RUPERT, B. C.—The sight of blood proved fatal to Miss Ella C. Carmichael. She died here a few minutes after seeing blood spurring from a finger her employer severed while preparing lunch.

SAN DIEGO—If it is possible for one to become entirely sober within three hours, then Tijuana, Mexico, was that yesterday. The entire city was shut down for that period during the funeral of Patrio Mee Hong, Tijuana's Chinese capitalist.

WALLA WALLA, Wash.—A bullet wound received last September has resulted in the death of William Charles, a lifer at the state prison. Charles died of shock during an operation to remove the bullet, which lodged in his head.

NEW YORK—Gertrude Lawrence wears no stockings off stage. She says bare legs are cooler and healthier and in four months have saved her $700.

NORTH HALEDON, N. J.—So hot here that hens have been laying in drinking troughs and many have drowned.

NEW YORK—The hottest day of the year: Billye Straton, Dr. Straton's son, who is to be ordained soon, came out with the statement that the world is going plumb to hell.

PHILADELPHIA—Senator Ernestine Callen, daughter of the president of Mexico, recently being called a flapper and ultra modern; she regards herself simply as a modern girl.

NEW YORK—If that Chicago editorial writer who got Rudy Valentino all hot up turns out to be a woman, well, the movie chick will just laugh the matter off. But it's a man, we know him; a man's sized he-he-he is threatened.

FOR SALE—A1 saddle horse. Phone 134.

FOR SALE—10 acres, 6 miles south of Roseburg on Pacific highway. Ideal for chickens. All cultivated, about 43 acres bearing apples, fair improvements. Price $2250; terms. Write Geo. Mellett, Box 661, Coquille, Ore.

FOR SALE—Team of mules, 7 and 8 years old, weight 2600. A. J. Hughes, Roseburg.

FOR SALE—Oak block wood, $3.50 per tier, in two tier lots. V. N. Lahtat, phone 12-F-33.

GOOD RANGE—$14. Also Economy jars, 610 Short St. So. of Coen Lumber Co.

FINE FREE STONE PEACHES—Lots of them at Brand's Road Stand. Prices reasonable. Pacific Highway, 4 miles north.

FOR SALE—Shrop rams; 2 A-1 milk cows, J. V. Chenoweth, Oakland.

FOR SALE—Apples and crabapples at orchard, 34 miles west on Looking Glass road. Phone