The SECRET STUDIO

By Hazel Livingston

The Story So Far

Rosemary Merton quits college following a romance with Philip Eames, who disappears. Employed in a book store, she has an innocent affair with Larry Kane, an artist, and later meets Sloan Whitney, just about town, with whom she falls in love. She breaks with Larry. Nina Clark, employed in the same store goes to Spain to join her dead father. Rosemary is given the use of her luxurious apartment. Mrs. Merton dies. Rosemary encounters Whitney after an engagement, and he tells her he cannot marry her, but asks her to go abroad with him. She asks time to think. She discovers Whitney is drinking habitually and breaks with him. He disappears. Cuyler, wife mistaking Rosemary for Nina, attempts to shoot her, dropping dead of apoplexy in Rosemary's apartment. Rosemary is held in prison during an inquiry and on her release is discharged from her position. Nina cables she and Cuyler are married. Phil returns and begs Rosemary to marry him at once. She refuses, telling him she loves Whitney. Meeting Larry, Rosemary is given a clue that leads her to his apartment. She finds him with Cecelia Lansing, singer, whose protegee she has long claimed to be. Now go on with the story.

CHAPTER 62.

"Come on in the other room," he said thickly. "Cecelia can sing, while you hold my hand. Got a piano in the other room!" He tottered and nearly fell.

"Why don't you get on the other side and help him?" Rosemary whispered fiercely to Cecelia.

Cecelia only smiled enigmatically and glided ahead, holding the doors open for Rosemary and her trailing burden. When they had reached the high-backed chair near a table, that's where he spends most of his time. He can rest his head on the table!

Almost at the same minute Toki entered with the tray, and set it on the table, beside Sloan. With an effort the drunken man roused himself and lifted the bottle. He held it unsteadily against a glass, and the amber liquor gurgled into it, over flowed, and trickled into the tray.

"S-s-s!" The Japanese steeled his hand, took the bottle from him, and himself filled the other two glasses.

Sloan watched him, solemnly. "Awful waste good liquor," he muttered. "Little touch rheumatism in my arm. Can't seem to hold anything heavy."

He picked up his glass. "Well, here's to the reunion. What's the matter, Rosemary, on the wagon?"

"Well, that's too bad. Cecelia'll drink it for you. Cecelia's a good scout. She likes her liquor! Watch her drink it down!"

Rosemary had been watching. She saw Cecelia touch the glass to her lips, and stealthily pour its contents into the flower bowl on the table back of her.

Cecelia's pale, expressionless eyes met Rosemary's. "Humor him," she whispered.

But her lips trembled. She watched Rosemary narrowly, nervously. Rosemary thought, and at sight of this convulsive movement of Cecelia's lips, that for a moment, searching for a suspicion was born in Rosemary—a suspicion that this wasn't the first time she had "humored" Sloan—a suspicion that she WANTED to make him drunk.

But why? Why could any one wish such a thing of all Cecelia, who was mad as a hatter?

"Have another!" Sloan said, reaching for the bottle again.

"No more now," Cecelia said firmly, putting it out of his reach.

"Well, for God's sake!" He looked at her with his mouth open. "What's the matter with you? Putting on for Sloan?"

He began to laugh, drunkenly. "First time I ever saw you refuse—first time I ever—"

His voice trailed off. His head fell forward. He was asleep.

"You see?" Cecelia said scornfully, rising and facing Rosemary. "What did I tell you? A lot of good it did you to force yourself in here. I should think you'd be ashamed, a young girl like you."

Rosemary didn't answer. She sat stolidly in her chair, biting her lips.

"He'll sleep all afternoon!" "I can wait," Rosemary answered.

Cecelia hesitated. She got up and moved reluctantly about the room, straightening a chair here, patting a cushion there, running her long white fingers over the piano. "No use of my warning you to go, I suppose?" she asked finally.

Rosemary shook her head. "I'm going to wait and talk to him."

Cecelia shrugged. She went over to the bookcase, and chose a bright jacketed volume. With her slender feet on the window sill, and her back to Rosemary, she was soon lost in her book.

The man slept on. Now he sighed in his sleep and now he snorted and groaned and once he mumbled unintelligible words. But Cecelia never moved, and neither did Rosemary.

In the outer room the phone rang. Cecelia started, half rose from her chair. "I wonder if that's for me," she murmured.

Toki put his head in the door. "For you, madam," he whispered. "I'm not here!" she said sharply. Toki permitted himself a small sneaker. "Very uncomfortable, but I have already said otherwise."

"Thank Mr. Hoffer."

With a stifled exclamation, Cecelia left the room.

When she came back she was wearing her hat and coat. "For the last time, Rosemary Merton, I'm going to ask you to go. You don't know what you are letting yourself in for staying here. You think I'm jealous of you—that I'm trying to prevent a meeting? She snapped her fingers contemptuously. "When you have your little talk you'll see otherwise. I'm Sloan's friend; that's all. I'm trying to stick to him in his trouble. Unlike some others—"

Rosemary's eyes fell. The shot told.

"I can come here, and stay with him when he's bad, because—well, because I'm Cecelia Lansing! Who'd dare to criticize a Lansing! And if that were not enough, I'm Sloan Whitney's protegee—and as my backer, putting up a lot of money for my debut in Milan, he is interested in my voice—if not in me. Everyone in musical circles knows that—you heard the Jap say that Hoffer called me here. I'm going to his studio now for a lesson, because he can't come here, as he usually does."

"And let me warn you of an other thing. Sloan has been drunk four days. There's no telling what mood he'll be in when he comes out of it. You're only belittling yourself and laying yourself open to the contempt and pity of everyone who hears about it—and Sloan tells everything he knows. You didn't know that, either? His doesn't mean any harm—"

she smiled engagingly. "But things. All your little secrets—"

"All right, but I'm going to wait—"

"As you like!" Cecelia smiled. She went over to where Sloan slept in his chair and straightened the rumpled silk dressing gown he was wearing.

Then she patted his head, a little intimate gesture. "Poor, bad boy," she murmured. And, picking up the book she had been reading, she left the room without another look for Rosemary.

A feeling of utter helplessness settled over her. Here she was, sitting in Sloan's room, a stranger, completely cut off from his life, from all intimacy with him. Sitting here, waiting to talk to him—to try to help him—when he didn't want to be helped, and another woman who loved him was trying to help him, too.

The memory of Cecelia's slurs lashed her. And she had stood there! Forged herself to take them, to hold her ground—for the sake of a man who had forgotten her, who no longer loved, perhaps never loved her!

She thought of Cecelia straightening his coat, smoothing his hair—little intimate gestures—possessive—showing her so plainly how she was left out.

The shadows lengthened, the sun crept away from the long French windows. How late it was getting! How late, and she with no job, and no place to stay even!

"I'm a fool—I'm ten thousand kinds of a fool! He doesn't want me!"

Soon it would be dusk, and still she sat there waiting. "I'm a fool, all right. But I don't care. I don't care whether he wants me or not. I'm going to drag him out of this! I'm going to pull him back—somehow—even, even if it's for Cecelia!"

She watched his dark head from her place across the room. Once his hands twitched. Once he half opened his eyes. "He'll be waking up soon," she thought. "I—I could touch his hair once, like Cecelia did, while he's still asleep. He'd never know. If I could just touch him—it would help so!"

Stealthily she crossed the room. Gentle, oh, so gently, she touched his hair. How ill he looked—so this—so helpless. Even his hands looked different—so pathetically dangling at his sides.

She lifted one, intending to rest it on the chair. But somehow she was holding it against her cheek, warming it—it was so cold.

"Rosemary? . . . What the devil do you want?"

UNCLE SAM TAKES ADVANTAGE OF THE SLUMP IN COTTON

(Associated Press Leased Wire.)

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27.—Every job in the navy has a sporting chance of soon owning nine undershirts, seven handkerchiefs and seven socks.

Bids have been received by the Navy Department on 700,000 undershirts, 600,000 handkerchiefs and 300,000 pairs of socks, all to be made of cotton. The government is taking advantage of the low price of that material.

When a state goes to improve its apple crop it usually begins in one of several localities, does the best it can in these places and keeps other apple growers of the state informed about the progress made. Such undertakings are called demonstrations, because they show how the thing is done.

That is exactly the way Oregon has gone about improving the crop of apples. At present there are five counties in this state that are providing an adequate and efficient health service to every community within their boundaries.

Of course there must be funds to carry on and extend this work. The funds for this work are supplied entirely through matching federal funds. Oregon has accepted federal funds to improve its crop in the fields and in the past two years it has also accepted them to improve the crop at home.

A word from you to your legislator will assist materially in obtaining adequate funds with which to carry on the work of providing you with health protection.

NOTICE TO ACCOUNTANTS

Notice is hereby given that sealed bids will be received by the County Court of Douglas county, Oregon, up to and including Wednesday, February 2, 1927, at 10 o'clock a. m. for a complete audit of the books of the sheriff, treasurer and county clerk, for the year 1926. Successful bidder will be required to give a bond to be approved by the court in an amount equal to 25 per cent of his bid.

The Court reserves the right to reject any and all bids.

HEALTH BULLETIN

(State Board of Health.)

Intelligent care of the mother-to-be is a means of safeguarding the lives of both mothers and babies in Oregon. There is an increasing consciousness in all civilized countries of the importance of decreasing the heavy loss to the community due to the high death rate among mothers at child birth and among infants during the first year of life. Saving the lives of mothers and babies is largely a matter of giving the mother and child a square deal. One of the greatest problems today is maternity and child hygiene. Each year in the counties of Oregon there are about 800 deaths among children under a year old or approximately one out of every twenty born alive.

A better understanding on the part of mothers of baby hygiene, baby care, and baby feeding, has cut down the death rate among older babies. Many little lives can be saved when the mothers are properly advised and cared for before the babies are born.

Some interesting figures have recently been published that are of interest to every mother in Oregon. A survey made in 25 cities showed that 8 per cent had received proper instruction before the birth of their babies. Among these mothers there were no deaths. Among the other four thousand women who did not have such advice one woman in every 96 lost her life at the birth of her baby, and in this last group there were six times as many baby deaths as in the number born to women who had prenatal care.

These figures are just as true in Oregon. Thousands of mothers in this state have received and are receiving advice and instruction through the Bureau of Nursing and Child Hygiene of the State Board of Health.

Oregon boasts of the lowest infant mortality in the United States. Many lives can be saved by providing an adequate service for the instruction and care of mothers and children. The Federal government will cooperate in this work on a 50-50 basis. Every state in the United States with several exceptions has some form of organized service for the conservation of the lives of mothers and children.

When a state goes to improve its apple crop it usually begins in one of several localities, does the best it can in these places and keeps other apple growers of the state informed about the progress made. Such undertakings are called demonstrations, because they show how the thing is done.

Did You Ever Stop to Think

By Edson R. Waite, Secretary of the Shawnee, Oklahoma, Board of Commerce.

Alvin K. Matthews, editor of the Santa Cruz (California) Sentinel, says:

That the newspaper profession is one of the highest to which a man or woman can aspire and all engaged in newspaper work should tell the truth in writing advertising copy and never "color" news.

That a good newspaper is a standing advertisement for the community it represents. Every citizen can help in the making of his local paper by subscribing to its circulation—at a cost that is low and a value that is great.

Every community gets its money worth through the home newspaper. It is the truck that carries the goods to market.

That President Calvin Coolidge analyzed advertising in a most interesting and instructive manner when he recently said in an address to advertising agency men: "Advertising, we see, has in its power the inherent forces of our modern industrialism. Goods have to be sold—they do not sell themselves. This selling must be accomplished through advertising."

That he attributed to advertising much of the success of the American industrial system and a large share in bringing about American scale of wages, which is the main support of our home market.

That on the foundation of marketing production through the demand created by advertising, much of the success of modern industrialism is not an economic waste. It ministers to the true development of trade.

Newspaper advertising of goods, foodstuffs, etc., is of benefit to the manufacturer and merchant as well as to the consumer, creating and retaining a market for the seller and providing information for the buyer.
