

HOW MUCH PER EGG?

That is the real question, not how much per sack or ton.

And the place to start feeding for eggs is the first feed you give your baby chicks.

We could sell lower priced feed but not lower priced egg production.

Start your chicks right, and keep them right.

You can't beat Crown Milk and Grain Feed for baby chicks.

The SECRET STUDIO

By Hazel Livingston

CHAPTER 54.

The story so far
Rosemary Merton quits college, following a romance with Philip Eames, who disappears. Employed in a bookstore, she has an innocent affair with Larry Kane, an artist, and later meets Sloan Whitney, man about town, with whom she falls in love. She breaks with Larry. Nina Clark, employed in the same store, goes to Spain to join Stanley Cuyler, an old friend of her dead father. Rosemary is given the use of her luxurious apartment. Mrs. Merton dies. Rosemary encounters Whitney after an estrangement, and he tells her he cannot marry her, but asks her to go abroad with him. She asks time to think. She discovers Whitney is drinking habitually and breaks with him. He disappears. Cuyler's wife, mistaking Rosemary for Nina, attempts to shoot her, dropping dead of apoplexy in Rosemary's apartment. Rosemary is held in prison during an inquiry and on her release is discharged from her position. Nina cables she and Cuyler are married. Phil returns and begs Rosemary to marry him at once. She refuses, telling him she loves Whitney. Meeting Larry, Rosemary is given a clue that leads her to Whitney's apartment. She finds him drinking with Cecelia Lansing, a singer. Rosemary stays until Cecelia has gone and attempts to sober up Whitney.

Now go on with the story.
She was awfully tired. More tired than she had ever been before. So tired that she sank down on the stone steps of the apartment house to rest, before waiting on to look for a room.

The fountain tickled coolly. The scent of the lilacs rose in the still night air, like incense. One green baby with the waterlilies was only a dense shadow in the fog.

"But I've won," she thought, and her pulse beat strongly. "I've won. I don't know how it is all going to come out yet, but I have my word. I'll keep his word."

She laid her cheek against the cool stone, to cool it. "I've won—out he's so broken. He used to be so different. So arrogant, and unkind, and reckless!"

She shut her eyes, trying to put out the picture of Sloan tottering, spilling liquor with shaking hands, sleeping suddenly, with his mouth open, sprawling amidst still cutting an empty glass.

"Years came stalking. Other fears. Fear of Cecelia, in her pale, cold beauty, pouring the contents of her glass into the brass bowl that held the marigolds on the table. What did Cecelia want of Sloan? Why did she want to make him drunk? And look—the Jap—how trustworthy was he?"

And what of you? What of you, Rosemary? Her aching limbs, her throbbing head seemed to cry, "I have you thought what all this is going to cost you?"

"I don't care," she whispered. "I don't care what happens to me—it only I can pull him back—into the light!"

And so, with that strange mixture of exaltation and sorrow buoying her up, pressing her down, she lay on the sidewalk, waiting, scarcely needing which direction she took.

The street lights flowed palely in the fog. Tall apartment houses, hotels, clubs bulged on either side of the street. No rooms near here, nothing that she could afford to rent.

She stopped a street car, climbed aboard and rode to a section not so far from Sloan, where she could afford to stay.

"Room and board." She recognized that familiar sign in the window, even before she came close enough to read the letters. One place was like another. It didn't matter—just a place to stay.

She went up the stairs. A little girl of six or seven opened the door. "Mamma, she called, without leaving her place at the door. 'Mamma, a lady about the room.'"

A thin, sharp-eyed woman came, wiping red hands on a soiled blue apron. "I don't usually rent rooms so late at night. It's after 9," she said doubtfully.

"I know," Rosemary answered. "Perhaps I had better go to a hotel tonight. But I'm moving rather suddenly, and I saw the sign—"

The woman looked at Rosemary's neat, dark dress, at her fresh, almost childish face. "I usually ask for references. I'm very particular about my place. I have some very nice people here. But—would you like to see the room?"

The room was at the back of the second floor, a small, dingy room, with a sagging bed and stained wall papers where other boarders had splashed. "Hot and cold water in every room. The use of the bath is two bits extra. Two meals. Most of my girls eat lunch downtown. Sixty dollars a month."

"Could I pay by the week?"
"Some of them do—"

Rosemary took three five-dollar bills out of her purse. "Is that right?" There was still some silver left.

"But where's your suitcase if you're moving in tonight?"
"My trunk and everything will be up tomorrow. They're at my sister's. She—she hasn't room for me. Company's just came. That's why I'm moving so suddenly."

"Oh!" The woman brightened. "You'll like it here. I set a good table. And the sun streams in all day!"

After she had gone Rosemary closed the door and opened the windows. But the heavy cooking smells oozed under the doors. Quarter past 9. Not too late to go back to Sloan's—just to make sure.

On the way she stopped at a confectioner's and drank a cup of chocolate. The hot liquid warmed her, strengthened her a little.

She hesitated as she got off the car in front of the Drury Lane. It seemed so foolish, coming back now, at this hour of the night. Surely he would be asleep.

She glanced up at the windows. If only she knew which were his! Perhaps she could go quietly up the stairs again and see if there was a light—

She tried the big, white door, but it was closed.

Then she rang the bell, but no one answered.

"Oh, well—I guess the Jap went to bed, too. There's nothing to worry about—he was so tired, poor boy. And I'll get there awfully early in the morning—and if everything is all right I'll go back to the employment place and get some work. I'll have to get work—with only $4 left and one week's board paid!"

The sun shone brightly in the morning, but not in Rosemary's little back room. Nor did it shine in the basement dining room where she hastily ate her breakfast.

Dampness hung over the house—dampness and the ghosts of boiled dinners, long since departed.

Two of the last dollars went to the express man to bring her trunk. "Oh, well—I'll get something today—or tomorrow. If I made Sloan promise I ought to be able to make Miss Swenson give me a job."

The big, white door was unlatched when she got there at half-past seven. A colored man was mopping the stairs. He glanced at her curiously as she passed.

"Some people—awful, awful," he muttered. "Some people they don't care how much they track in."

But Rosemary had no thought for muddy feet. She sped upward, her heart in her throat. What if he had asked and asked for her? What if he thought she had failed him again? What if he expected her to stay and reached out for her from his sick bed—for he was sick—alcoholic poisoning. Cecelia had said—and didn't find her?

"I should have come back—I should have got in some way last night—I was a fool to give up so easily."

Full of sick fears she rapped on the door. The old Japanese opened it, and at once. "How is Mr. Whitney?" she gasped. "Is he here?"

"Yes, he here. I think too early for this time of night."

FIRST PICTURE OF THE BERLIN BABY

(Copyright, 1927, Paul Cross.)
This is the first picture ever to be taken of the famous Berlin baby, Mary Ellen Berlin, with her mother, Ellen Mackay Berlin, taken in a mother and baby planned to join "Baby" Irving Berlin at Palm Beach, Fla. It was rushed to The News-Review by telephoto process from New York to San Francisco for NEA Service, Inc.

SHE DANCED

Although church organizations protested against dancing at the inaugural ball at Oklahoma City, Okla., Mrs. Henry S. Johnston, wife of the state's new governor, learned to dance especially for the occasion. She is shown here in the new gown which she bought for the inaugural ball.

The brighter picture is painted by the Department for the livestock industries. The dairy industry is reported to have had a favorable spread between milk and feed prices most of the year, poultry producers were relatively prosperous, and hog producers have had the most advantageous spread between corn and hog prices in several years, although the cholera epidemic last fall wiped out many opportunities for profit.

"Cattle feeders did not have a very profitable experience last year," according to the report, "yet the movement of cattle into the Corn Belt up to December 1 indicated about as large a volume of feeding this winter as last. Range cattlemen appear optimistic. The number of sheep and lambs on feed December 1 apparently exceeded last year's number by at least 200,000 head, the increase being in the Corn Belt with a heavy decrease in Colorado. The recent pig survey covering 11 Corn Belt States indicates only about a 4 per cent increase in the fall pig crop, less than 1 per cent increase in the total 1926 crop, no increase in the 1927 spring pig crop, and a probable decrease in hog slaughter during the marketing year 1926-27."

Of five leading farm crops, only potatoes had a purchasing power in November above the pre-war parity, says the report. Cotton, corn, wheat, and hay have an exchange value so low as to discourage any expansion of production this spring. The livestock acreage this spring, excepting cattle, have a considerable brighter exchange unit—cattle, although low priced, are still at an advantage as compared with feed prices.

"One of the chief factors of stability in the present situation," says the department, "is the fact that low-priced crops are to some degree offset by higher-priced products. The general index of purchasing power of farm products, in terms of non-agricultural commodities, declined another point in November to 80, the five pre-war years being considered as 100."

PAST YEAR BEST FOR PRODUCERS OF LIVESTOCK

The events of 1926 convey a clear warning for the Cotton Belt, reasonable assurance to livestock producers, and suggest conservatism generally as to crop acreage in 1927, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture concludes in its January report on the agricultural situation.

"Considering the country as a whole," the report says, "1926 seems to have registered in the minds of a majority of farmers as a disappointing year. The rise in prices of farm products in 1924, which was fairly well sustained during 1925 had aroused still further hopes for 1926, but the sharp slump in cotton, grain, and fruit prices this fall reduced the purchasing power of extensive regions and brought the season to a rather depressing close. Many producers of winter wheat, potatoes, and certain livestock products did well, however."

"The crop season was a harassing one with very late spring, widespread drought in early summer and much rain during harvest. Although the major crops finally turned out about average yields, their quality was lowered, with much consequent discount to farmers from the nominal market prices. The value of the principal crops, based upon prices December 1, was $7,801,000,000 compared with $8,949,000,000 a year ago. In spite of lower prices, however, about 2,000,000 acres of 5 per cent greater area of winter wheat was sown this fall than last."

The brighter picture is painted by the Department for the livestock industries. The dairy industry is reported to have had a favorable spread between milk and feed prices most of the year, poultry producers were relatively prosperous, and hog producers have had the most advantageous spread between corn and hog prices in several years, although the cholera epidemic last fall wiped out many opportunities for profit.
