Daughters of Midas

THIS HAS HAPPENED

T. Q. Curtis, millionaire department store owner, takes Billy Wells Nyda Lomax and Winnie Shelton from his store and places them in his home for one year, because he wants to help further ambitions each has expressed. Billy, who wants to be a concert violinist, is the only one that is serious. The others lie to enjoy his generosity.

Billy is infatuated with Dal Romaine, nephew of Mrs. Meadows, their hostess. She is harassed by the fear that he is "playing her and Winnie Shelton."

Through everything, she loves Clay Curtis, son of her benefactor, who has disinherited himself and is living with Billy's mother in the poor part of town, working in a factory by day and writing music at night.

Unknown to T. Q., the girls learn he intends to adopt one of them when the year is up. Nyda and Winnie institute a series of intrigues to gain his affection. Billy loses interest in her violin and finally has a breakdown.

T. Q. begins to question the wisdom of his philanthropic experiment when he finds that Nyda, for whom he modeled a new kindergarten room in order to help her with her work, is not interested and is careless and unkind with the children under her care.

Believing the girls need a change, he takes them to Europe for several months. Upon their return, they find the town in an upheaval over a Hindu fortune teller. All three girls are told amazingly intimate things by the strange man. Ralph Truman, a friend, says he believes the Hindu is an accomplice. When the Hindu and Dal Romaine disappear simultaneously, Billy recalls Ralph's words and is vaguely troubled. She hears occasionally from Dal but his letters leave her unhappy. One night she passes Nyda's room and hears Nyda and a man quarreling.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY

CHAPTER XLVIII

When the calamity which Billy had feared did break with violence upon the Curtis household, she found that her sixth sense had played her false in only one particular—Winnie Shelton was not hurt or involved in it in any unpleasant way. Her position was merely strengthened by her obvious innocence of any wrongdoing in that instance, at least.

Billy was to wonder many times after the whole ugly drama was over why she had not been acute enough to suspect far more than she had of what was going on in Nyda's tormented mind. For instance, why had her usually alert mind not registered the fact that Nyda Lomax had taken an acute interest in the safe in the library?

Old T. Q. had made no effort to keep the girls from knowing about the safe and its contents, nor had he been even reasonably careful in working the combination in their presence. He had insisted that they keep their jewelry in the safe when they were not actually wearing it. The value of the entire collection did not exceed ten thousand dollars, but one night, when handling out their "jewelry," as he called them, to the girls, he had taken a small chamois bag from the safe and had shown them half a dozen large, unset diamonds.

"Guess I'm sorta superstitious about diamonds," he grinned. "I heard someone say when I was a half-grown boy that he'd rather have diamonds than money in the bank. I bought this first diamond with the first five hundred dollars that the store really didn't need. During the last twenty years I've owned a good many diamonds, partly because I love the looks of 'em and the feel of 'em, and partly because of that old superstition that they were the possession that they were the soundest investment. Once I had to sell all but this first one to start my business over a bad year, but I've bought a stone every once in a while. Pretty things, ain't they?"

And later Billy wondered why she had not been alarmed at the look of greed in Nyda's eyes as they watched, with almost religious intensity, every turn and twist of T. Q.'s fingers as they worked the combination of the safe.

Later, when suspicion of the robbery of T. Q. Curtis library safe fell upon herself, Billy could remember those things and wonder at her own stupidity. How easy she had been! How blindly she had played into Nyda's hands that night before the robbery!

Winnie was not at home that night. She was at the bedside of her father, who was ill with pneumonia. And because a doctor had sat all night by the desperately sick man's bedside, too, her alibi was perfect.

Billy and Nyda had spent the evening at home. Nyda supposed in bed all the time was "raging" headache, according to Mrs. Meadows, who sent down to Mrs. Meadows and T. Q. at the dinner hour. After dinner Billy played her violin for the two old people, concluding the short program with Clay Curtis' lovely, lilting, somewhat sad little song, "To an Autumn Day."

Mrs. Meadows went away early, and the girl and the old man sat for an hour, talking first of inconsequential things, and, finally, of Clay Curtis.

heard the first two movements of it played by a symphony orchestra there, as a favor to him, of course.

"An artistic success is all right," T. Q. frowned to hide the light of pride in his stern gray eyes. "But how about a little financial success? Does the fool boy intend to work in a factory the rest of his life?"

Billy bristled instantly in defense of Clay, though her heart throbbed with a dull ache at the mention of his name. "If you took any interest in popular songs, Daddy Curtis, you'd know that Clay is already on the road to financial success. He wrote a sentimental little song—words and music, both—called 'Little O' Love,' that is being featured in a musical comedy in New York, and that everyone's singing and whistling and waiting to right now. He may make a fortune on it—one foolish little tune, but a tune that gets into your blood and haunts your dreams."

"A fortune out of a song!" T. Q. smiled wryly.

"Mother says Clay is shy about the song," Billy went on. "He despairs that sort of music, is embarrassed when he hears his own songs over the radio or on a phonograph. I'm awfully glad for Clay. He's worked like a slave, night and day."

"I'm proud of him, too," T. Q. said in a low voice, not meeting her eyes.

She left him then, with his memories of his son, and with the bitter-sweet thought of that son's coming success.

When she reached her own bedroom at ten o'clock, Billy found Viola turning back the covers of her bed and laying out her things for the night.

"Miss Nyda she say can you come see her a minute before you go to sleep," Viola told her. "She still got a powerful bad headache."

"Tell her I'll come in about half an hour," Billy answered.

She wanted to tell the wonderful things that were happening and about to happen to him. She had seen her mother that very day, had felt an unworthy jealousy of her mother's fond delight in Clay, her pride in him.

"Clay has become more her own child than I am," Billy confessed to herself, then began to weep forlornly.

The year which had promised to be so wonderful was nearly over. In less than a month the year of probation would be ended. Two girls would go back to hard work and poverty. If she were one of those two—and she had no earthly reason to believe that she, and not Nyda Lomax, would be chosen for adoption by T. Q.—she would be really worse off than she had been at the beginning of the year.

After she had bathed, she resentfully wrapped a negligee about her for the duty call upon Nyda Lomax.

"I was just dying to talk to someone," Nyda greeted her with unusual friendliness. "Sit down on the edge of the bed; I'll move over. I want you to help me plan a costume for the masquerade ball at the Country Club."

The two girls talked for almost an hour. It was nearly half-past eleven when T. Q. Curtis knocked at the door, asked with kindly solicitude about Nyda's headache, and then called out his good nights in a cheerful voice.

room, after having delivered Nyda's book to her, she went to the window she had opened for the rush of wintry air. Why had she acted like a thief caught in the act, she asked herself distrustfully. Her thoughts were broken into suddenly by the faint sound of a familiar whistle. She leaned far out of the window, her heart beating fast with sudden, wild joy. That was Dal's signal. He had come back! And he wanted to see her! He could not even wait until morning. She stretched out her arms into the coldness of the night and then ran to dress.
