(From O. A. C. Exp. Station.) Foam on the leaves of strawberry plants is caused annually by the "spittle bug" which may be controlled by applications of any fine dust--powdered air-slacked lime, sulfur, wood ashes or even road dust generously applied. The bug hits various plants by injecting its beak into the foliage and sucking up the juices.

Alfalfa is usually ready to cut when in full bloom, but earlier cutting may be advisable to protect the second crop. The crowns are examined before the crop reaches the blossom stage, and if the young shoots are developing rapidly the crop is best cut regardless of blossom development.

In growing young cattle either for dairy or market considerable attention is needed in the problem of providing enough time for satisfactory bone growth. Growth and development of the livestock industry in western Oregon are said by experiment station specialists probably to depend more on growth of legumes than on any other single factor. The least expensive method of providing calcium is through legumes, which carry large amounts of available lime.

The two principal matters of importance in the summer period of Oregon bee culture are manipulation of supers during the honey flow, and either maintaining the queens or requeening for the coming year. Preparation for the main honey flow season are best made by repairing and refilling the supers before the main flow begins.

Logged off lands of western Oregon are even better suited to sheep than to cattle, although much may be said on both sides of the question. The vegetation is said by the experiment station authorities to be well suited either to sheep or to cattle. Pure grass such as orchard grass, rye grass, timothy or blue grass is better for cattle, while clover is better for sheep.

Oregon may fairly be said to be destined to become a factor in the walnut industry of the United States provided required conditions are properly met. The problems here are distinct from those of other states, the first being demands for deep, fertile and well-drained soils.

If Oregon consumers were to demand sweet cream butter the problem of providing good butter would be solved. The price would then be based on the product that was in the greatest demand, and creameries would be forced to demand sweet cream deliveries, a real point, since milk and its products are quite perishable. Oregon grain farmers have thrown a lot of inferior varieties into the discard, says the expert.

meat station, and standardization has progressed wonderfully in the last few years. Some of the varieties at one time fairly important are now declared to be as extinct as the dodo, not even specimens being available. It would be a good thing if a few more were as completely eliminated.

The cherry fruit fly that makes the cherries maggoty in parts of Oregon may be expected to emerge with the next continued warm weather spell, and unless promptly poisoned will put eggs into so many cherries that when the maggots grow up they may pretty nearly walk the fruit out of the boxes. The control spray is lead arsenate a half pound, molasses--not honey--2 quarts, water 10 gallons. It is put on very lightly, about the time Royal Anns begin to show good color, followed by two other like applications a week to 10 days apart.

Commercial fertilizers are used profitably on certain Oregon soils and crops, the experiment station declares, to improve both quality and yield. Profitable returns call for thorough drainage, proper tillage, adequate supply of organic matter, use of lime in humid sections and correction of alkalinity in arid regions.

In putting on supers for extracted honey the Oregon beekeeper usually experiences but little difficulty in getting the bees started in them, particularly if the supers have drawn combs in them. It is a common practice among some beekeepers to place the brood nest which contains the largest amount of brood on the lower story next to the bottom board, then the empty super, and then on top of that the hive body containing the least amount of brood. The queen, if possible, should be in the lower story.

POULTRY REMINDERS (From O. A. C. Experiment Station)

Green feed for poultry is cut fine in a feed-cutter and fed in a green feed hopper. In a hopper it stays together and remains succulent much longer than when thrown upon the floor or into the yards and scattered around by the fowls.

A catching coop is of use on the poultry farm when fowls are treated for lice, vaccinated for chickenpox, or when culled graded or moved. It saves labor with less danger of injuring the fowls.

A can or barrel large enough to hold a week's supply of grain in each poultry pen saves time and labor. A slanting top prevents the fowls from roosting on it. Poultryment is canned by many Oregon housewives and with simple methods a good tasting meat preserve is made. By the following method a 2-pound dressed fowl gives about 1 pint of solid meat and 1 pint of jelly. The raw meat is taken off the bones and cut up, so it will go into the jars easily. It is packed in cleaned, tested, glass jars to 1 inch of the top. A half teaspoonful of salt and seasoning is added, but no water. Covers with new rubbers are placed tightly on the jars. Then the jars are put into a tightly covered container, like a pressure canner or steamcooker, but a washboiler or sapbucket will also do. The water is heated to boiling point the meat sterilized 4 to 5 hours. Before taking the cans from the sterilizer they are lightly scalded. When these jars are stored in a dark and cool place the meat remains good for a long time.

PRUNE MEN COOPERATE ON GROWER-PACKER PLAN A grower-packer plan of marketing the northwest prune production was unanimously adopted by the convention of more than 150 growers, packers and market specialists held at O. A. C. June 1. Contracts for handling the 1927 crop will be drawn by a committee of nine to be appointed by Andrew Miller of Portland, chairman of the organization committee. When duly approved by the reassembled convention a campaign will be put on to sign up the growers and packers.

The new plan provides for continuation of existing cooperative associations with power to market the output of their members, and for sale by independent growers through the various packers, who will receive a flat rate for their service. Prices will be determined from time to time by a committee of five, four growers members of a central board and one member selected by them.

This central board will set standards of quality and pack, direct advertising, settle controversies and serve as a sales clearing house. This provision will permit advance buying by the trade with assurance of protection against price slashing. Contracts will be made with the cooperatives providing that their tonnage will be handled under the uniform regulations of the committee.

Provision is made for closing the pools for the 1927 crop not later than June 29 but they may be opened for specified times at the conclusions of each year's business. All contracts will be continuing with withdrawal privileges at the end of any year.

Contracts with independent growers are to become effective when 50 per cent of the acreage is signed up. Additional tonnage not included in the organization output is to be handled by packers in such way as not to give outside growers any advantage over members. Good sizes remain much the same as now except that certain fruit is to be labeled Extra Large, Large or Medium, and not run lower than 50 to the pound. Over riding brands of "Tart-Sweet" for the Italian prunes and "Oregon Sweet" for the Petite were approved.

PORTLAND ROSE FESTIVAL RULER

Blue eyes, attractive dimples, and all-around talent figured in her selection. She likes tennis, horseback riding and swimming; is a good cook, a pianist and also an artist, having won two state amateur prizes. Her ambition is to be a teacher. She has a mind of her own, too, for her robe will be pink, "more becoming," she says, than the conventional white.
