DEMPSEY WINS OVER SHARKEY IN 7TH ROUND

completed arrangements to shift the fight to a site outside New York because neither last night's battleground nor any other in the metropolitan district affords seating capacity to compare with the arenas in Philadelphia or Chicago. The Dempsey of today may not be the "Dempsey of Toledo" the "man killer" that battered Jess Willard into a helpless hulk with as devastating an exhibition of punching as the ring has ever seen. He may not, either, be as formidable four years ago when he slugged his way to victory over the giant Argentinian, Luis Firpo, but he has come a long way along the comeback trail, observers seem to agree, since the dreary, rainy night last September when he floundered around against Tunney.

First Round Sharkey's Dempsey's once lightning-like speed of foot has vanished although his shiftness remains. His punches carry again terrific power and somewhere, apparently, he has regained a great deal of the old resource that enables him to "take it" and come back to win. Last night, in the first round, he was perilously close to defeat. He was tottering, groggy, under the impact of a series of solid hooks to the head, and bleeding from the mouth. But he had the stamina to weather this sudden storm and keep plunging in with a relentless attack to the body that paved the way for the finishing blows, where a year ago he was unable to rally from a first round pummeling.

It took only a few seconds for last night's finishing picture but it was a thrilling climax in spite of the subsequently disputed views of it. Not only was there controversy over whether Dempsey's blows were fair or foul but wide difference of opinion as to whether it was a right or left to the body that was low and a right or left to the head that provided the climax. Dempsey, as well as Sharkey, settled the latter issue. They agreed it was a right hook to the body and a left hook to the jaw that furnished the victorious combination.

The Disputed Final

Dempsey came out of his corner in the deciding seventh round and ripped in close, as he had done consistently in the previous rounds. They had whirled around, Dempsey's head buried in Sharkey's shoulder, when suddenly the former champion sank a short vicious blow to the sailor's waistline. Sharkey turned his head toward the referee, apparently to claim a foul, and doubled up but they were still mixing as Dempsey shot over his left. There had been no attempt by Referee O'Sullivan to interfere or warn Dempsey if he thought the latter's blows too low. And although he hesitated a second or two, as Sharkey went down on all fours, the referee quickly took up the count and at ten, waved the sailor "out."

To observers on some sides of the ring it appeared Dempsey's right to the body was several inches below the waistline and therefore foul. To others it appeared on the borderline while just as many more were equally confident the punch was altogether fair. The referee shared the same view and his decision appeared upheld when Dr. William Walker, boxing commissioner's official physician, declared after examination of Sharkey that no evidence of injury or a foul blow was apparent, at least on the surface.

Body Blows Will Sharkey To a majority of ringside critics, Dempsey seemed to have a distinct if not decisive advantage on points when the knockout came after 45 seconds of the seventh round had elapsed. Sharkey's offensive wilted or was held back after his slashing first round drive. He gave ground steadily under Dempsey's persistent hammering to the body. Occasionally the sailor countered with hooks to the jaw that jarred Dempsey, notably in the third and sixth rounds, as well as the first. He cut Dempsey's right eye, mouth and nose, while remaining himself virtually unmarked, but his attack was for the most part wild. But Sharkey's usually accurate left jab failed to stop Dempsey's rushes as it had Maloney's. The sailor's vaunted right cross frequently swished aimlessly thru the air as Dempsey easily blocked it or ducked out of its reach.

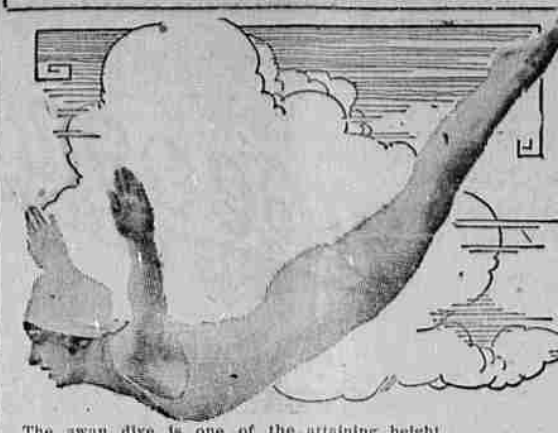

Sharkey's confidence, the factor that has been so conspicuous in his ring success, seemed to ebb as he found his belt blows missing, or failing to bring down his foe while Dempsey beat a steadily drum fire on the sailor's ribs.

Three Distinct Steps Are Seen in Making the Swan Dive

BY JAMES A. LEE

Athletic Director, Cleveland (Ohio) Athletic Club

The swan dive is one of the dives that form the foundation of the diver-to-be. The swan dive consists of three important factors, namely the take off, form in the air, and entry in the water. The take off must be smooth and lively, using at least three steps, the last step being a jump. Then swing the arms from a position extended even with the shoulders, downward and upward in front of the body into the swan position. This arm action helps the diver in attaining height.

When leaving the board upward and outward, the body must be rigid and graceful. All movements must be easy and feel natural.

The back should be well arched, head up, arms extended to the sides parallel with the shoulders, ankles together and the toes well pointed.

Just before entering the water the arms are brought above the head with fingers rigid. Keep the body rigid till the dive is completed. A building, which for several years has been an eyesore and firetrap, is being torn down at the corner of Main and Oak streets. The old wooden building, which has occupied the corner is to be removed entirely, and the two adjoining buildings are to be greatly improved. The building fronting on Oak street is to have a concrete floor and a new roof, while the interior is to be improved, and the brick building fronting on Main street is also to be repaired and improved. The corner is to be occupied by L. R. Chambers, Nash agent, after the improvements are made.

DEFICIT FACED BY GUARANTORS OF CHAUTAUQUA

Chautauqua came to an end last night with the presentation by The Scots of the play "Apple-sauce."

This proved to be a very delightful comedy-drama and gave a fitting climax to the week's series of programs. This year's chautauqua financially was not a success, as there was a deficit of several hundred dollars. The guarantors met yesterday with the club manager and discussed the situation, the company finally making a small cut in the amount required. The guarantors will be required to apportion the loss among themselves. Due to the fact that the financial end of the chautauqua has not been successful for several seasons, it is not expected that a new contract will be signed and Roseburg will probably be without a chautauqua next year.

The tent was torn down today for removal to the next stop, and the superintendent and junior superintendent are also moving on to their next assignments. While the financial part of the chautauqua was not satisfactory, the programs were fully up to the high standards maintained by Ellison-White upon their circuits.
