THE BRIDAL GOWN

EVEN IN THESE INFORMAL, FEMINISTIC DAYS THE ALTAR COSTUME RETAINS ITS IMPORTANCE

By HENRI BENDEL For NEA SERVICE

NEW YORK, July 23.—This has been called the "Age of Informality." Workingmen call their president "Cal"; children abandon the conventional "father" and "mother" for their parents' first names; one can attend the opera in street clothes; and everywhere the fine old tradition of "being polite" falls before the psychoanalyst's dictum: "Be natural."

ding takes quite a different attire from a delightful home affair in a garden setting beside white lilacs. Traditional White Satin. White satin, I think, will always be the first choice for materials for wedding gowns. Maybe it is because of the rich tradition that enhances the material that her mother's mother chose, or maybe it is just the exquisite shimmering virgin beauty of the material, that makes the average girl love satin. White satin just naturally looks like a wedding dress to the average girl.

The petite bride is really the favored daughter of the Gods. She can wear almost anything. But, why should she not emphasize her petiteness and charm by selecting a dainty frock that will enhance her fragility? Of Crepe Roma. Ideal for this type is the illustrated crepe Roma wedding gown, which sums up fashion in its up-in-front fullness, its bolero effect of crystal embroidered crepe, its unusually attractive neckline and its formal train that hangs like a cape from the shoulder.

Even to feminists, the wedding day is still the "day of days." Likewise the bridal gown has increasing prestige by being a tradition still accepted as "good." But while bridal gowns in older days were as definitely prescribed by the rigid prevailing mode of the hour, brides today can let their imaginations run away with them and have anything from an old colonial period gown to a futurist frock.

In my own creations I consider the individual. The tall, lithe girl has her grace best set off by a semi-fitted gown similar to the one shown today of white satin embroidered elaborately with pearls, with a touch of green in the center of the flowers. Simple elegance has this gown with its long sleeves flaring over her hands like old-fashioned mitts, its length broken by the introduction of tulle skirt and tulle for the V front.

One recent garden wedding for which I designed the costumes had the bride and all the bridesmaids in taffeta bouffant frocks, the bride in white, her attendants in pastel shades. Another novel wedding gown had a sleeveless jacket of old heirloom lace over a straight gown of crepe Roma.

Two rules and only two must be followed by the bride choosing the most important costume of her life. First, she should consider her type for the bridal gown must be becoming. Second, she must give heed to the kind of wedding it will be, formal or informal. For of course a formal high noon wed-

Many Touches of Color. Along with white this season many a touch of color is found. Blue in the softest shade, green and pink are known to fashion brides' dresses. But more often color is introduced in the decorations.

OUR NEIGHBOR, THE MOON Just a summer evening when stars begin to peep. And the sun hides its zimmer, behind a mountain peak: A full moon is seen rising from far, far away. And it becomes brighter and brighter, when fades away the day. It looks so big and round, when it first comes into sight. Peeping from behind a mountain, and reflecting down its light. On so many various things, that are on this planet of ours, including Mother Nature's products, and our great buildings and towers. It seems to be real close, just across the way. But when we go to averaging its distance, it's many miles away. But still it is our nearest neighbor.
