HUNDREDS BATTLE WITH BLAZES IN NORTHWEST WOOD

(Associated Press Local Wire)

PORTLAND, Ore., Aug. 5.—Hundreds of fire fighters today waging a grim battle against forest fires in national forest preserves of the northwest.

Most of the fires were started by electrical storms during the past week, unaccompanied by rain. Latest reports available at the federal district forest office here showed that about one hundred fires were burning in the Columbia-National Forest, south of Washington and 100 fires on the adjacent Rainier forest.

One fire, covering 100 acres, was burning uncontrolled on Railroad creek in the Chelan Forest, Wash.

Sixty four fires have been reported in the Wenatchee national forest in the past five days.

The largest fires in the Columbia reserve are in what is known as the Yacolt burn, an area of 300,000 acres burned over in 1902. The old fire left thousands of snags standing, trees killed, but only slightly burned.

Forest officials keep a constant guard over the area, fearing the day when a blaze would get started in the tinder like timber. At present there are four large fires sweeping over the old burn. All efforts are being directed toward surrounding the four fires, with no attempt being made to save the forests between the fire areas.

The Vancouver army barracks has supplied mules, trucks and a squad of men to aid in taking supplies in to the fire fighters in this region.

Another large fire in the Columbia forest is sweeping over an old burn of 3,000 acres on the Little White Salmon watershed, threatening a heavy stand of young timber.
