The PENNY PRINCESS

COPYRIGHT 1927 by NEA Service, Inc. BY Anne Austin

BEGIN HERE TODAY
Jerry Macklyn, advertising manager for Peach Bloom Cosmetics, gets the consent of Vera Cameron, his secretary, to transform her into a beauty. She agrees only after seeing and falling in love with a stranger.

In refashioning her, Jerry has in mind the use of her pictures in advertising. He asks the beauty specialist to use as a model the portrait of a beautiful girl he supposes to be a movie actress.

Vera wants to go to Lake Minnetonka on her vacation, to meet the man she loves. At the summer hotel, she meets him. His name is Schuyler Smythe. He and other guests make her for Vivian Crandall, heiress and ex-princess. Her attempts to convince the guests of their mistake are unsuccessful. Smythe falls in love with her, and denies the rumors he is engaged to Nan Fossdick.

Vera, or Vee-Vee, as some call her, finds it difficult to declare her real identity to Smythe, especially since it is apparent he is in love with the girl he thinks she is. In her room, Vera picks up a newspaper and finds the name of Vivian Crandall in bold headlines.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY CHAPTER XXIII
So closely did Vee-Vee feel herself identified with a girl she had never seen, of whom she had scarcely heard until three days before, that it seemed that she was reading about herself as her eyes took in the big headlines:

"DETECTIVES SEEK MISSING CRANDALL HEIRESS."
In the center of the front page was a picture of Vivian Crandall, with the caption: "Vivian Crandall, until three weeks ago the Princess Vivian, wife of Prince Ivan Polaski, of Russia's repudiated royalty, is the object of a nationwide search by private detectives, according to information received from friends in the confidence of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ritus Worrell Crandall, multi-millionaire society leaders of New York and Newport."

The column of front-page type gave little more actual information than the caption under the portrait. The picture might have been a photograph of herself, Vee-Vee noted with fresh wonder. It showed the Princess Vivian in decollete evening dress, with three strands of pearls about her proud neck, a jewel-studded coronet on her bobbed head.

One paragraph of the small type declared: "Prince Ivan, the husband whom the Princess Vivian divorced in Paris is in New York, registered at the Plaza Hotel. The Prince declares that the heiress divorced him without his knowledge and that he has come to New York to find his former wife and to plead for a reconciliation and re-marrying. He scolds the idea of the Prince's disappearance, and is convinced that she will reveal her whereabouts in her own good time.

to have kept you waiting," she told him.

She was about to leave the room, her heart beating quickly at the thought that she would see Schuyler Smythe in just two more minutes, when a knock sounded upon the door, a discreet, deferential knock. She thought it was the waiter, come to remove her breakfast tray and table, called "Come in," bilitely.

But it was not the waiter. It was the hotel manager, Mr. Thurston, his bald forehead glistening with the dew of embarrassment, his big white hands massaging themselves nervously.

"Miss—er—Cameron, I beg you to pardon this intrusion," he began deprecatingly, "but I felt it my duty to—er—your parents as well as yourself to speak to you."

"I haven't the least idea what you mean," Vee-Vee said, raising her chin arrogantly.

"You have seen yesterday's papers, haven't you, Miss—Cameron?" Thurston asked with more spirit.

"I have seen it, yes," Vee-Vee admitted. "But I still fail to understand."

"I don't want any scandal, Miss Cameron," the man went on doggedly. "I—we all appreciate the honor of having you at the Minnetonka, and I hope you will stay all summer. But I—should very much appreciate it, Miss—Cameron, if you would notify your parents that you are here, so that there will be no possible reason for them to blame the management for not having notified them of your presence here. I—I feel the responsibility very keenly, Miss Cameron."

"My name is Miss Cameron," Vee-Vee interrupted, her voice even and firm. "I told you when I first came that I would trust you to correct any misapprehension that might arise as to my identity. One lobe of my brain, listening critically, told her that she was talking like her old self, like the Vera Victoria Cameron she had been before her transformation."

"I know, Miss Cameron," the manager hastened to assure her. "And I should have been very glad to assist you in your effort to remain here incognito. But with detective looking for you, likely to pounce upon you at the hotel any minute and cause a scandal," he hesitated unhappily.

"I assure you, Mr. Thurston, that no detectives are looking for Vera Victoria Cameron, that I am Vera Victoria Cameron, and that you should feel no uneasiness whatever on my account." But as she said the last words, color flooded her pale face. She knew she was lying, that the poor, distracted manager had far more to fear because she was Vera Victoria Cameron than if she were the Vivian Crandall that he took her to be.

comes up, of an unpleasant character, I mean, that you will solve the management of the Minnetonka from all blame."

"The only thing that you could possibly be blamed for is for not believing me," Vee-Vee told him severely. "I shall be glad to leave the hotel, Mr. Thurston, if that would relieve your mind."

"Oh, by no means," the unhappy man protested. "As I have told you, we are honored to have you here. I hope you are comfortable?" He was the solicitous hotel manager again.

"Quite comfortable," Vee-Vee assured him briskly. She was thinking that if she obeyed her impulse to flee from the Minnetonka that night she would be tacitly confessing to Thurston that she was Vivian Crandall, and that he would have every right to notify the Crandall family to watch for her at the Grand Central Station.

Her detention in the station would inevitably result in her being handed before the Crandalls for identification. Their discovery of her resemblance to their daughter—a resemblance that no one would believe had been achieved accidentally, since haircut, shaping of eyebrows and coloring of hair could not have been affected without deliberate design—would just as inevitably brand her as an impostor.

She might even be arrested for fraud, would undoubtedly find herself smeared all over the front pages. She was trapped, horribly trapped, whether she left the hotel or stayed.

When Thurston had left, looking very unhappy, Vee-Vee again flew to her desk to complete her telegram to Jerry Macklyn. But again, before she had finished it, she halted, her pencil stalling viciously at the yellow sheet.

"No, I'm not going to get him into a mess. I won't let him take the blame. It might cost him his position with Peach Bloom." And again, irrationally, while tears gathered in her vivid green eyes, she murmured, "Dear Jerry!"

But there were no tears in her eyes when she held out her hand to Schuyler Smythe. She was as sparkling with eagerness and excitement, determined to make the most of the precious hours that were left to her before the storm broke. For she was sure that there would be a storm, and that she would have to face it alone, unless—

Her vivid eyes probed the glowing brown eyes of Schuyler Smythe as if she had never looked deep into them before.
