Atlantic Still a Lure to a Bevy of French Pilots

Two new French planes which are expected to tackle the westward trans-Atlantic flight soon are pictured here. At the top is the "France," with Captain Louis Coudouret (in uniform) and Count Louis de Mailly-Nesle alongside it. Below is the plane designed along "Spirit of St. Louis" lines by Sergeant Detroyat (lower right), who will fly it alone.

PARIS, April 27.—The spirit of Lindbergh is behind the flying activities of Sergeant Jean Detroyat. He is considered one of the foremost French contenders for trans-Atlantic honors.

Detroyat was at Le Bourget field the night of May 21 of last year and was one of the French airmen who spirited Lindbergh away into the darkness and out of the hands of the enthusiastic crowd immediately after he landed. Lindbergh always was grateful for this thoughtful assistance and invited Detroyat to come to America as his guest.

"Why not fly over?" Lindbergh asked with a smile as one airman to another.

Builds a New Plane

Since he became acquainted with Lindbergh and carefully inspected the "Spirit of St. Louis," Detroyat has supervised the construction of a new model of an Avimeta-92, which now appears surprisingly like Lindbergh's machine. It is an all metal monoplane, beautifully streamlined, and driven by a 200-horsepower Wright whirlingwind motor. The Detroyat design is a single seater.

The new machine has been a mystery plane, carefully guarded at the military field at Le Bourget.

Expenses of building it and for any flights it will make are being met by the firm of Zibon-Verdun, raz, manufacturers of macaroni, the chief owner of which was an "ace" in the World war and companion of the celebrated Guynemer. Detroyat will fly with the familiar stock insignia used by Guynemer and seen in the United States on the machine flown by Costes and Le Brix.

Detroyat is almost as tall as Lindbergh and nearly as thin. He is, professionally, one of Lindbergh's most ardent admirers. He says he merely intends to do long-distance flights across Europe, but his friends believe that if the plane gives satisfaction in these tests he will not delay long in getting started for New York. And, like Lindbergh, he will fly alone.

Another Team

Captain Louis Coudouret and Count Louis de Mailly-Nesle also will be ready for an attempt to fly from Paris to New York soon. They will attempt the flight in a speedy monoplane which has been christened "France."

The "France" is a Bernard machine, designed by the late Jean Hubert. It is driven by a 600-horsepower Hispano-Suiza motor and probably is the fastest machine entered so far in the trans-Atlantic race.

Both Captain Coudouret and Count Louis de Mailly-Nesle, are war veterans with fine records. The captain is attached to the 24th squadron, but has been granted leave of absence for the trans-Atlantic venture. He will pilot the "France," and his companion will act as navigator and wireless operator.

And Still Another

Still another pilot who says he is only waiting now for the weather to break is Naval Lieutenant Paulin Louis Paris, who flew the first mail plane to South America. With government support, he will attempt to cross the Atlantic by way of the Azores and Bermuda, in a new C. A. M. S. bi-motor seaplane. He plans to carry a mechanic and a radio operator.

Waiting behind Lieutenant Paris in this venture, to help him in case of need or to attempt the crossing if he fails, will be Captain Francis Gullbaud, naval flyer. The Latham company is now completing a seaplane which Captain Gullbaud will use.

Maurice Dronchin, one-time pilot of Levine's Columbia, still is making tests with his "Arc-en-ciel"—the Rainbow—which is a new type tri-motor monoplane. It was designed specially for an Atlantic flight by Rene Couzinet, young French pilot and engineer.

Edward Fosse... wooed for 15 years, and lost.

"I am not dead; I am hurt but I am not slain. I'll lay me down and bleed a while, But then I'll rise and fight again." MAILTON, Ill., April 27.—During the 15 years that he wooed her persistently, Edward Fosse never lost sight of his goal. He was a handsome, well-dressed man, and he was a successful business man. He had a habit of passing her home, gazing and loitering. If she chanced to be walking where he was around, he would either slow up so she would pass, or would walk fast so as to pass her.

He had called her as often as 15 times over the telephone in one afternoon, and the calls were more frequent when someone was at her home. He would sit in church or in other places and stare at her in such a way as to irritate, excite, and embarrass her.

She pointed out that as a result of such staring on March 4 she struck him in the face two or three times when he followed her to the church vestibule, and that since that time her life had been so unbearable she prayed for relief by injunction, which was granted.

It is temporary, and the case has been set for hearing on May 7. Both sides have employed attorneys.

Since the writ was granted Fosse has behaved nicely. He had to draw his money out of the bank where she worked, so he could transact his banking business, but he slipped in at noon when she was out to avoid staring at or seeing her.

All these years, it seems, he has been laboring under the impression she is mad at him because of a report someone circulated that he had bought her a ring while she taught in a school district where he was a director.

Miss Alkman is quiet about the affair. She sought the courts as a last resort.
