GREAT CROWD PRESENT FOR FARM PICNIC

The St. Lawrence river where on one side the people speak English and on the other side French. He also spoke of the Rhine river that divides the German and French speaking people, showing that because of these natural barriers and because of conditions that prevent people from mingling together they do not learn to know each other.

He then showed that this condition leads to fear and suspicion.

Ignorance Leads to Fear It is instinctive, he said, for people to fear the things they do not understand, and as illustrations he showed how the primitive people have worshipped the sun, the hillsides and the storm. Ignorance caused magic to be respected as science, and religion was built on superstition and fear.

He then drew a contrast between these conditions and those prevailing today.

Natural barriers are being broken down. First came the ox carts, then the wagons, then the railroads, the highways, automobiles, telephone, radio and numerous other developments and inventions that allowed people to get together, and the results are now making themselves manifest. People in the past have been of two minds, the city and the urban.

The farmer came to town to buy a pair of shoes and had to pay $10 for them, while at home he had a hide that he could not give away. Therefore, he became suspicious of the city merchant.

City people on the other hand, went out to the farms and saw peaches and pears and apples rotting on the ground and then came back to the city and paid 5 cents for a pear or 10 cents for three apples, and they became suspicious of the farmer.

Then the farmer coming into town in his overalls and work clothes felt out of place and failed to become acquainted, but now there has been a change. Better means of communication and news dissemination, better farm methods, better roads, etc., have broken up the isolation and are causing people to become better acquainted. Now the business man is learning something about farming and the farmer is learning something about business, so that the two classes are gradually coming to know each other better, are losing their fear and suspicion and are beginning to get together with their problems to work out solutions.
