WHIRLWIND

BY ELEANOR EARLY

THIS HAS HAPPENED
Sybil Thorne is going to have a baby. Only two people know of her marriage, and both were pledged to secrecy. Sybil meant that no one else should ever know. But now she must tell—and there are times Sybil thinks she had rather die.

The father of her unborn child is Richard Easton, an adventurer and a philanthropist. Sybil married him only two weeks, during a period when she was supposed to be vacationing in Havana with Mabel Blake. Terminating a ghastly hour, Sybil returns to Boston with Mabel Blake, determined that no one shall ever know of her sordid romance.

When she learns, however, that she is going to have a child, she is forced to tell her secret. Mabel is helpful and sympathetic. Her brother, Tad, is quite wonderful about it. But Valerie, her brother's wife, is inclined to scoff and taunt. Poor Mrs. Thorne, afraid of a scandal, sets immediately about getting accessories printed.

Then Sybil tells Craig Newhall, who has loved her for years, and hoped that some day she would marry him.

Now go on with the story
CHAPTER XXX
Only Craig's lips twitched, and a little cord in his neck. Sybil thought of a sketch she had seen of a foreign dictator, with a leonine head. People called him the Tragic Man of Destiny.

New Craig looked like that—a composite of tragedy. She saw the agony in his eyes, and could have cried aloud. Her own were full of fear—wild, hunted fear. And she sat reading one another's misery, in dreadful silence.

She reached and touched his hand. It lay on the tablecloth, motionless. And when she touched it, it felt like ice.

He opened his mouth to speak. "Why?"

Words came hard. He seemed to wrench them out, with effort. "Why... didn't you tell me... before?"

"I couldn't," she told him. Ineffectually she jatted his hand.

"His name was Richard Easton. I hate him now. I... I left him—in Havana. Shall I tell you about it?"

She talked in small, jerky sentences. "I think I must have been crazy. It was all so sudden... The Captain—and those women... Mabel begged me not to... And then, that very night... Oh, it was awful... Drink—drink—drink... Five months now."

A dull red suffused the grayness of Craig's face, and an obsequious waiter, hovering near, stared in startled surprise.

"Oh, please," Sybil interrupted herself nervously. "Send that man away. He's listening to every word."

He was thinking of their crowd. Dolly Weston and the Graysons. Valerie and her friends, and the rightous Mrs. West. And all the drinking, loose clique at the country club. People who commit only conventional sins are always intolerant of the unconventionalists.

"You poor little kid," he said, as he thought upon their warring tongues.

"Oh, Craig, you're wonderful! You're so good you hurt. I—id almost rather you slapped me."

Sybil was trembling violently. "M... my... teeth are ch... chat... testing. I'm so clumsy."

"Nervous reaction," he told her, and bundled her into her coat. Then he called a cab to take her home. He tucked her in warmly, and gratefully she pilloved her head on his shoulder. His arm about her shoulders held her close. The steps at her house were icy, and, lest she slip, he carried her to the door. There he shook hands.

and stood for a minute, speechless, with bared head, and his face as wintry as the night.

"Aren't you going to kiss me?" she cried.

She raised her head, and he touched her lips lightly with his. "Good night, little girl."

She let herself in quietly. The house was dark, and cold, and cheerless. She tiptoed upstairs and down the hall to her room. Undressing in the dark, she crawled into bed, and curled up, to keep warm, like a child, with her arms about her knees.

Then, in the cold and the dark, tears came—and all it's bitter sorrow and regrets that come at midnight to tired women, alone with their thoughts.

Valerie suggested a trip to South Carolina. Sybil herself felt that it would be better to go away somewhere. But Mrs. Thorne after consulting Mr. Crandon, felt that nothing would be gained by secrecy.

At three p. m. on January second Mrs. Thorne told her psychoanalyst all about it. She had gone to him directly from the store, where she had ordered, of a discreet clerk, 500 belated announcements of her daughter's marriage.

"Mrs. Edward Thorne announces the marriage of her daughter, Sybil."

"Don't you think we had better date them July?" she had asked tearfully of Tad.

"But mother," expostulated Sybil, "I didn't know him in July—I hadn't even met him!"

Valerie shrugged her shoulders eloquently.

"All drive you down town, mother," she offered. "And you can take a taxi to Mr. Crandon's."

The afternoon sun was slanting across the consultation room. In the alcove beyond a maid was bustling herself with tea, cups and a delft cracker jar. There were spiced caramels in a blue vase, and a crackling fire, and a kettle humming on the range.

Mr. Crandon had learned that a confidential atmosphere is a decided aid to psycho. He drew a Boston rocker a little nearer the blaze, and helped Mrs. Thorne off with her moleskin wrap.</
