THIS HAS HAPPENED

Ashtoreth Ashe, adventurous stenographer, becomes involved in a dramatic affair on shipboard. Ashtoreth is taking a cruise to the West Indies and has encountered two particularly interesting people. Mona de Musset, with whom she rooms, is a mysterious lady of exceptional beauty, who possesses rare charm and priceless pearls.

Jack Smythe, an Englishman, warns Ashtoreth against Mona, and declares that the girl is not to be trusted. Ashtoreth is naturally shocked, but Mona has been so kind to her that she declines to sever their brief friendship. In a few brief days Mona will have left the ship at the island of Guadeloupe, a French possession in the Indies. Ashtoreth resolves to treat her as usual.

Smythe, who has already kissed Ashtoreth once, persuades her to go on the lonely boat deck with him. And there he makes love to a fashion utterly new and thrilling for Ashtoreth.

Suddenly, from the shadows, a woman approaches them. It is Mona, who turns on Jack in uncontrollable fury.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY

CHAPTER XX

"Now Mona," Jack Smythe spoke soothingly, as one humoring a recalcitrant child. He even touched her shoulder.

"Don't you Mona me!" she cried. And drew away as though his touch had burned her. "You—you—"

"No scenes!" he commanded curtly. "And you'd better get out of this, you know. It's none of your business, Mona."

Her dark skin was livid with fury. And her nostrils quivered with the excitement of her unleashed emotions.

"Easy, now," he cautioned. "Easy," she hissed. There was something dreadfully primitive about her sibilant fury. Smythe turned to Ashtoreth.

"The woman seems determined to make an exhibition of herself," he said. "Perhaps Miss Ashe, you had better go below."

But Mona had snatched Ashtoreth's wrist.

"No!" she ordered. "She'll stay here."

The Englishman had grown very pale in the moonlight. Philosophers say that the superior man can find himself in no situation in which he is not master of himself. But there is no superiority born of man to rule the fury of an angry woman.

And no one, assuredly, had ever mastered Mona in a rage. Smythes police seemed to increase her agitation.

Now she wheeled on Ashtoreth like a whirlwind.

"I told you," she cried, "that he was a bad man. He made love to me, like to you. And then he put it in a book—and sell it. People buy his book to read why I go wrong."

And he make money.

The volubility of her (trade) chocked her, and she stopped for breath. She put her handkerchief against her mouth, and when she took it away, Ashtoreth saw that there was blood on it.

"Mona!" she cried. But the other girl shrugged impatiently.

"It is nothing," she said. Ashtoreth shuddered. "Don't be so excited. You've made yourself ill. It's awfully dangerous. Mona—blood in your mouth, like that. It might be from your lungs you know. A hemorrhage."

"It's all right, ma chérie," she whispered. Her voice had grown weak, with exhaustion or fright. "A short life and merry one, mon petit chéri."

Smythe cleared his throat. "You ought to see the doctor, Mona," he declared. "If you will go to your cabin, I will ask him to attend you immediately. It's suicidal this way. My God, you ought to get yourself under control."

Mona laughed mirthlessly. Smythe looked at her coolly, and turned to Ashtoreth.

"Mademoiselle," he observed, "seems to imply that—"

But Mona cut in hotly upon his imperturbable humor.

"Guff!" she shrieked. "Please, Ashtoreth!" he besought, "take her down with you. She's simply killing herself."

Mona allowed with difficulty, pressing her fingers against her lips. Her color had faded, and her skin had taken on the tinge of old parchment.

"You know so freely of my blood," she told him calmly. "You—so smug! So self-satisfied!"

"Please, Mona—"

Ashtoreth pleaded brokenly, dangerously near tears. The scene had completely upset her, and she felt overwhelmingly sorry for the girl.

"Please," she coaxed, "come down to our room. I'm so worried about you. Please come, Mona."

The Frenchwoman put her hands behind her on the rail.

"In one little moment," she promised. "But first I must tell you—so that Meester Smythe will hear—"

"But I don't care, Mona! It doesn't make any difference. You can tell me anything when you feel better. If he's been your sweetheart, Mona—and you're hurt, dear—I shan't ever see him again. I swear."

Ashtoreth drew Mona toward the companionway.

"My 'sweetheart'!" Mona laughed. "I have had plenty of sweethearts, ma chérie—and some I have loved. But I split on Meester Smythe!"

She spat.

"I hate him!" she said. "Listen, Ashtoreth—the woman's crazy."

Smythe placatingly. "If she's trying to make you think—"

Mona laughed in his face. "He put me in a book," she repeated, and sell it. He call poor girl—and psalm-sing through his nose."

"I wrote a book," explained Smythe. "Mona imagines that it was she of whom I wrote. It was published last year. And Mona seems to have been considerably incensed."

"He make love to me," insisted Mona stubbornly. "I put it in a book—to make money. Now he make love to you—and put it in another book."

Smythe's mouth tightened at the corners.

"That's absurd," he declared. "I refuse to discuss it any further. You're utterly preposterous. Mona, I've told you already that your imagination has simply run away with you. You're talking like a fool."

"I talk to him before," explained Mona. "When you go to bed, ma chérie. And I make him promise to keep his hands off you. He promise—and I say 'Very well'—then I shall not tell."

"And then," flared Smythe, "you came sneaking back from shore, to spy on us!"

"I do it to take care of Made-moiselle," explained Mona, quite unruffled. "She is one good girl. You're a great one to take care of anyone!"

Smythe turned on his heel. "You can't even take care of yourself."

"No?" Mona's voice was soft again, and throaty with that curiously thrilling quality that Ashtoreth had noticed the first night. "I take very good care of myself, Meester Smythe."

"Oh, yes," he retorted brutally. "You flower in flame!"

Mona touched the long pearls that hung from her ears, and lifted the triple string of pearls around her neck. She shrugged her shoulders.

"You do not hate me, ma chérie?"

Her eyes were soft now, with a calm, blue tranquility. And she smiled her luminous smile. A little sadly, a little wistfully.

Ashtoreth kissed her pale cheek swiftly.

"No, Mona," she said. "I do not hate you. Poor, poor Mona."

Tears sprang to the Frenchwoman's eyes.

"I have known," she said, "bad women who understood good women. But never before a good girl who would forgive a bad girl. You are very kind, ma chérie."

She turned mockingly to Smythe. "Maybe," she suggested impudently, "Meester Smythe can write another story—for the American public, and their cinema. A story about a bad woman, like a raging fire. And a little good girl, like a white flame, eh? And a man who made love to them both."

"Come, Mona," begged Ashtoreth, drawing her to the stairs. They went to their cabin and Smythe remained on the boat deck where they left him. Ashtoreth rang for the stewardess, and persuaded Mona to lie down. Then she went herself to find the doctor.

He inspected Mona's blood-stained handkerchief gravely, and took her temperature.

"Eet is nothing," she insisted. But her temperature was 104. The doctor examined her lungs, tapping sepulchral.

"I have what you call ze ad-he-sions," she told him.

"And you do not realize what that means?" he demanded sternly.

"Mals eul," she told him severely. "I am content."

(To Be Continued)

Mona talks of life and love in the next chapter, and Ashtoreth hears the philosophy of an outcast.

TURFMAN DIES AT 104 BESIDE LOSING HORSE

(Associated Press Leased Wire)
HAVANA, Jan. 29.—A turf career extending over a period of 90 years has ended here with the death of Tom (Top) Cheek, 104-year-old trainer. Cheek died of a heart ailment.

Shortly after he had seen his horse, Basila, an also-ran in the second race at Oriental park, he complained of a violent pain in his chest. Physicians said the trainer was suffering from heart trouble, but he refused to go to a hospital, preferring to go back to the stables with his horse. A few hours afterwards he dropped dead beside Basila on which he had placed all his money in the afternoon.

HAD TO WORK TOO HARD

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Gave Her Strength

Mt. Carmel, Pa.—"After my second baby was born I had to work too hard and be on my feet too soon because my husband was ill. After his death I was in such a weakened and run-down condition that nothing seemed to help me. I am starting the fourth bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and feel a great deal better. I am much stronger and don't get so tired out when I wash or work hard. I do housekeeping and dressmaking and I highly recommend the Vegetable Compound. I am willing to answer letters."—Mrs. GEORGE BUTTS, 414 S. Market St., Mt. Carmel, Pa.

BALTIMORE GIRL STUDENTS OUSTED FOR DRUNKENNESS

(Associated Press Leased Wire)
BALTIMORE, Jan. 29.—Following the suspension of three students in the Eastern high school for girls for alleged intoxication in class last week, Dr. David E. Weglein, superintendent of public instruction, sought today to determine whether liquor can be purchased by students from neighboring speakeasies as has been reported.

The girls were suspended after they had caused a general disturbance in class. School officials said the girls were under the influence of liquor.
