Orchid

THIS HAS HAPPENED Ashtoreth Ashe, determined little stenographer, has wrung a proposal of marriage from her wealthy employer, Hollis Hart is said to be the most eligible bachelor in America.

You can hardly blame Ashtoreth for being elated. She is a very beautiful girl, but poor as a church mouse, and infinitely removed from the charmed circles in which Hollis moves. He is old enough, perhaps, to be her father, but a rather handsome man, and lovable.

He tells Ashtoreth that he loves her with all his heart, and gives her a little tender name—Orchid. Because, he says, she reminds him of the loveliest flowers that grow. Ashtoreth loves him, too. At least she thinks she does. Probably at most any girl would love a handsome multi-millionaire, who made love divinely, and adored the very ground she walked on.

They have been together for a glorious week in a little house on a mountainous island in the West Indies. The meeting was entirely accidental, but Ashtoreth—naturally—made the most of it. She was traveling at the time for her health. Hart was taking one of his frequent cruises, and had stopped off at Dominica on his way to South America.

Now they are on their way back to Boston, returning on the cruise ship which Ashtoreth unconsciously abandoned at Dominica as soon as she saw Hollis.

ly falling over their fat selves, trying to make up, if I'm good enough for you, I'm good enough for them. The old hypocrite! Why, Holly, do you realize that I might be the most unusual thing in the world. What do they know? I left the boat at Dominica, and was away for a whole week. And I bet anything they've heard that I was at your house. But what do they care?

Just because you're got money, you can buy their good opinion of me. They don't snub me, because they wouldn't offend you. And I think the way they fawn is perfectly sickening! They'd give anything in the world to be friendly with you. Why, darling, they'll even swallow me!

Her vehemence amused him. "It is pretty raw," he admitted. "But what do we care, Orchid? 'Oh, I don't care,' she retorted slyly. "It just makes me sick, that's all."

"The Dunks want to have a dinner party for us tonight," he told her. Ashtoreth spat out wrathfully. "I hope," she declared, "you told them to go to the devil."

"Well, not exactly," he admitted. "It was Mrs. Dunks, you see, who asked me. But I sort of implied something of the sort. I told them we had another engagement."

"She sniggered happily. 'And we'll sit right beside them,' she cried, 'all by ourselves!'"

"Exactly," he agreed. "The Simpsons asked this morning if we were engaged," he told him. "I informed them that our relations were an entirely personal matter."

"You did?" he chuckled. "And what do you suppose they're going to say now? You shouldn't talk to me like that. Orchid, and she doesn't look particularly holy. As a matter of fact, she's a young modern mother—and God knows how many centuries old she is. A little slim thing, with tiny features. Holding her baby in a frightened sort of way, and not complacent at all, like the other Madonnas. Nobody knows who fashioned her, nor when. Nor where she came from."

Ashtoreth compromised. "Well, of course, you'll see and see her," she agreed. "But you'll take me to see Josephine Baker too, won't you, Holly? And I want to go to the Folies, and the Casino and Montmartre. And all the dress-makers. And every single blessed cafe in Paris."

She sneezed his hand ecstatically. "Oh, my goodness, dearest, I'm glad you're rich! You don't mind my being glad, do you?"

"Not a bit," he assured her. "Sometimes I'm glad myself."

"Well," she said, "it's certainly wonderful, the things money will do! I'd never have believed people could change like the women on this boat. When I was with Mona, they snubbed me outrageously. Because Mona wasn't anybody. And I wasn't anybody either. And they felt a million times better than either of us."

"Baby!" he chided. "The rule do 'But now! My dear, they're aim-places we liked." "For how long?" he asked. "Oh, a month, or a year, or forever."

"She shivered delightfully. 'Oh, Holly, isn't it just too wonderful—being rich!'"

"You'd like Africa," he told her. "And the Garden of Allah, where roses and jasmine grow in the desert."

"Oh, I saw the movie!" she exclaimed. "Is it like that?"

"It's lovelier," he pronounced solemnly. "You can't see the colors on the screen. Sunset and moonlight, and the dawns. . . . You'll love the bazars, too, Orchid. And I'll buy you all the eastern jewelry and perfumes in Constantinople."

"Have you been to Turkey, too?" she asked. "I heard a Turkish lady lecture once in Boston, Madame Halide Edib. She told all about the harems—but, my goodness, I never dreamed I could see the heavenly things she talked about. The mosques and minarets, and the beauty of old Stamboul."

"I had a strange adventure there," he told her. "The Arabs, you know, are a strangely emotional race. Well, I heard a group of dark-skinned sons of the desert talking once in a Turkish coffee house. There was an Anatolian girl dancing for them. A seductive creature. And the Arabs, intoxicated by her beauty, asked her to die. Mad with the loveliness of her voice and person, they declared they could not bear the idea of so much perfection existing on earth."

Ashtoreth shivered. "Were they drunk?" she asked.

"Oh, no—quite sober," he said. "Emotional—that's all. The world, my love, is full of the strangest people."

"And we're going to see them
