READ THE STORY, THEN COLOR THE PICTURE

The rain storm lasted quite a while, and then the sun began to smile, and all the clouds up in the air turned into white foam black. The sky was very pretty now. It changed from dark to bright somehow, but far away the Tinkles still could hear the thunder crash.

The doozygoos then looked around and he, "I guess it's safe and sound. The storm has moved away from us. I never like the rain. The month of April brings short showers, but they are needed for the flowers. I guess what seems to be my loss, as someone else's gain."

And then he told the Tinkles bunch that he had just thought of a bunch that ought to please each one of them and bring a treat quite rare. "Right now," he said, "I will begin to fly up where you've never been. We'll reach the top part of the sky and see who lives up there."

"A great idea," Scouty cried. "That's something we have never tried. I only hope that such a help won't take our breath away. Go right ahead, do what you please, and we'll all sit right here in case I hope you don't get tired out. In the air we want to stay."

Just then an echo of the storm flashed by and made the Tinkles warm. It was a streak of lightning. My, you know it scared each Tinkly, and then they saw a funny sight. The streak had stepped beside them and it formed a pair of stairs.

Well, Scouty jumped right up and said, "A great plan just popped through my head. That lightning leads to some place and I'm going to find out where." Before the real time to speak, he jumped out on the lightning streak, and much to everyone's surprise, he ran up through the
