Sixty-Five Musicians to Be Heard in Orchestra Here—In the coming of the Philharmonic orchestra of Los Angeles, Roseburg will have the opportunity of hearing what is usually considered the finest type of instrumental music. Sixty-five members of this organization are making the tour including the distinguished conductor, Georg Schaevevolgt. Every member is a musician of outstanding ability.

The modern symphony orchestra is made up of anywhere from fifty to one hundred instruments, a large majority of them belonging to the violin family. The orchestra is divided into three principal choirs or types: the string, wood, wind and brass choirs. In addition to these are the instruments of percussion (drums, cymbals, etc.) and the harp. The string choir is usually made up of 16 first violins, 14-16 second violins, 8-10 violoncellos, and 6-8 double basses or bass viols. The wood wind choir is made up of 3 flutes, 1 piccolo, two oboes, 1 English horn, 2 clarinets, 1 bass clarinet, 2 bassoons, and 1 contrabassoon. The brass choir is usually made up of a quartet of French horns, 3 trumpets, 2 trombones, and a bass tuba. The exact combination is determined by the composer. The beautiful tonal effects possible with such a variety of instruments cannot be described. The development of the orchestra into the modern symphony is a matter of the past 300 years. It assumed its present shape about 100 years ago. It has been a favorite form with all of the great composers.

The program that the Philharmonic orchestra of Los Angeles will play here on May 1 is one of unusual beauty and one that everyone can enjoy. The concert will be held in the senior high auditorium that holds over 1000 people. The interest that is already being shown indicates that this place will be filled to its capacity.

THE BETTER PLAN (W. Taylor Cooper) We'd find that it wouldn't be best for us. If all of our dreams came true, Could we always follow the path we choose, And do what we want to do.

The blue print that me may draw for my life, God uses as far as He can. But when it comes back, revised by His hand, We'll find it the better plan.

The measurements in our plan are not true.

If we build by it, we fail. It needs the touch of the Master's hand. He draws from a perfect scale. When dark clouds gather and shut out the sun, We know it still shines above. So, often the troubles that come to us, Are wafted on wings of love.

We fight sometimes, though it may mean defeat, Work, when we'd much rather play. It's all for the best and fills out complete, The program of Life's little day.
