The commission has already set an approximate period of two years for its work, he said, adding that "during that time the public is entitled to hear all the evidence brought before the commission both pro and con."

"It is entitled to weigh the evidence, judge the character of witnesses and the force of their testimony, and, in addition, it is entitled to study the commission itself and determine from the character of the questions propounded ed to witnesses, the thoroughness with which the investigation will be conducted."
