OKLAHOMAN WELL SUITED FOR PLACE ON U. S. FARM BODY

Carl Williams, Appointee of Hoover, Identified With Agriculture for 20 Years.

Headed Cotton Raisers and Stockmen and Organized Over One Hundred Cooperatives.

OKLAHOMA CITY, Okla., July 5.—Carl Williams of this city, selected by President Hoover as one of the members of the newly created federal farm board, has been prominently identified with farm relief movements for 20 years.

To this practical idealist, who was trained as a newspaper man and later pioneered many of the southwest's leading cooperative marketing movements, is ascribed a dynamic desire for action in agricultural affairs. Even a cursory check-up of his life history tends to prove it.

Mr. Williams' multifarious executive posts, both regional and national, have kept him in intimate contact with the livestock grower, the small farmer and the cotton magnate.

Since he organized the Oklahoma Cotton Growers' association, the first large scale cooperative cotton marketing business in America, his services have been sought so frequently that pecuniary gain long ago lost its appeal.

First Work in Colorado

Colorado was the scene of his first efforts to aid the farmer. He quit a newspaper career that began in Michigan to edit a magazine called "The Scientific Farmer". It was influential in causing farmers of that state to call a dry farming congress.

In 1910 he became ill and doctors told him he had three months to live. After a successful operation and more than two years' recuperation, however, he was in Tulsa to help stage another dry farming congress. Next he became editor of the Oklahoma Farmer-Stockman, which is read by thousands of farmers.

Great Organizer

In six years after 1914 Mr. Williams organized more than 100 successful cooperative grain elevators and cotton gins in Oklahoma. When Oklahoma cotton growers formed a cooperative movement that later spread to 11 states, he was its president. He likewise headed the American Cotton Growers Exchange for three years after its formation in 1921.

It was on this job that Mr. Williams gained the reputation of being the first farmer ever to ask Wall street for a $50,000,000 loan—and get it. He did that a few years ago when the cotton co-ops needed money to finance the selling of $150,000,000 worth of cotton.

Since then he has headed various associations of crop and livestock growers, guided the American Agricultural Editors' association one term, served on the federal board of mediation set up under the Watson-Parker railway act, and has had active posts in national organizations devoted to solving the problems of agriculture.

An unprofitable farm in Porter county, Indiana, was his birthplace. He is 51 years old, married, and has no children.

GOOD-NIGHT STORIES
By Max Trell

THE SHADOW-CHILDREN FIND A NEW FIVE-ROOM APARTMENT—IN A GLOVE.

"I've just found a new apartment where we can all live together," announced Yam.

Mij, Flor, Hanid and Knarf—the other little shadow-children with the turned-about names—immediately became interested.

"Where is it?" they asked.

"It's in the hall, on the table right under the hatrack."

"It can't be a very large house if it's there," remarked Knarf.

"It's not very large," admitted the little shadow girl, "but it's just large enough for us. There are five rooms and a large reception room."

"I'm certain I won't like it," grumbled Knarf.

The others were of an opposite opinion, however. "Let's go and look at it," suggested Hanid. They set out at once.

"Are you sure it's for rent?" Flor asked Yam as they were on their way.

"Well—it's vacant now. If we like it we can ask for the landlord."

By and by, they reached the little table in the hall, and there—just as Yam described—was the apartment. There were really two apartments.

"They're both exactly the same," said Yam. With that they entered the one farthest away from the edge of the table, as it seemed less likely to fall off than the other. They found themselves in a large low-ceilinged room. They gazed around with great interest.

"The walls look as though they were made of leather," remarked Mij.

"So does the ceiling," said Flor.

"And so does the floor," added Hanid.

"It is leather," said Yam. "It's a very unusual apartment. I've never seen one like it before."

"It's a Very Unusual Apartment."

The five rooms led off from the back of the reception room. The first room on the right was narrow but not too short.

"Would you like this room?" they asked Knarf. He shook his head. "Well," said Hanid, "it is just right for me."

The next room was no wider than the first but much longer. "Do you like this one?" they asked Knarf again. He shook his head. "Then I'll take it," said Flor.

After this they came to a room which was still longer. "I don't like it either," said Knarf.

"I'll take it," said Mij.

"The next room was a little shorter than the third and the second, but longer than the first. Knarf shook his head. But Yam said "I'll take it."

The last room to the left was set a little apart from the others. Knarf began to look interested. It turned out to be shorter than any of the others. At the same time it was much wider.

Knarf smiled. "I'll take this one," he said. All at once he gave an exclamation of annoyance. "Just look," he cried, pointing upward, "there's a hole in the roof."

"It's too late to change now," said the others. "You chose this room and now you'll have to keep it."

With that they returned to their own rooms and left Knarf to brood over his ill-fortune. He gazed at the large hole in the roof with misgiving.

"Suppose it should rain?" he said to himself. "What a fool I was to choose this room when I might have had any of the others."

Just then there was the noise of many voices in the outer hall.

"Don't forget your gloves, Frank," said mother. Instantly the apartment shook from top to bottom and in came five long fingers.

Mij, Flor, Hanid and Yam had to dash back out of the front opening.

"Hurry, hurry, run for your life!" they shouted to Knarf.

But he merely slipped lightly out of the hole in the roof.

"You see," he said boastfully to the others: "I knew very well what I was doing when I chose this room. I'm no fool."

MANY GREAT MEN FORMER ENGINEERS

(By NEA Service)

NEW YORK—The engineering profession has given to the United States many of its "biggest" men, according to the American Engineering Council.

Among these "greats," the most notable is President Hoover, who is the second engineer to become president.

Robert Patterson Lamont, Secretary of Commerce under Hoover, is another distinguished engineer. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior, was president of Stanford, one of the leading engineering schools of the country.

Governors Dern, Utah; F. C. Emerson, Wyoming; Clayton D. Buck, Delaware; Morgan F. Larson, New Jersey, and Geo. A. Parks, Alaska, are all professional engineers.

DIDN'T LAST LONG

MOSCOW.—What is thought to be a record for the shortest marriage was established here by a workman and his wife. They were squarrel started about where they on their honeymoon. On the tram office, boarded a tram and set out married by Soviet law and left the would live. Forty minutes after the marriage ceremony they went back to the Soviet office and asked for a divorce.
