GOOD-NIGHT STORIES

By Max Trell

WISE HAND TAKES ALL THE "KICK" OUT OF KNARF'S TRICK.

You'd never believe it—never in a thousand years! What? That a shadow could ever play a trick on you. Oh, no, you would say, "that's impossible." Perhaps you shall change your mind after you read this story of Mij, Flor, Hanid, Yam and Knarf—the five little shadow-children with the turned-about names.

Mij didn't play tricks, and neither did Flor, Hanid and Yam. But Knarf did. He was the trickiest shadow that ever had a master. He liked nothing better than to play tricks from the beginning of one day to the beginning of the next. And generally he succeeded.

Much as he liked playing tricks, this cunning shadow-boy rarely chose his own master to play them on. He was wise enough to know that the less trouble he got into himself, since he had frequently to do exactly what his master did.

One day, as it happened, little Hanid's mistress, Dinah, was sent to the butcher shop by her mother to buy a pound of steak.

"Now don't forget, dear," Mother said, "I want a pound of the very best steak. And please hurry because it's for dinner ready."

So Dinah hurried off to the butcher shop. On the way she met the other little children, who decided to go along with her. And the shadows went along, too.

at the butcher shop?" Knarf slyly asked Hanid.

"A pound of the very best steak," replied Hanid, who, you must know, was a very wise shadow-child. She was as wise as Master Knarf was tricky. She understood he was planning some mischief, but she pretended to know nothing. "A pound of steak," she repeated.

"Hm-m," remarked Knarf. "A pound of steak, hm-m." Then he chuckled to himself. Into the butcher shop went Dinah.

"Good morning, Dinah," greeted the butcher. "What do you want today?"

"I want a—" the little girl started to say when Knarf, making himself as small as a pea, sprang upon her shoulder and whispered in her ear: "—a dozen sausages!"

Dinah didn't hear him. What happened was that a thought suddenly entered her head. That is the way that shadows talk to real persons.

Dinah said to the butcher, imagining really that this was what she had been sent to buy. Master Knarf had driven all thoughts of the steak out of her mind, you see.

Before Hanid could correct the mistake, the sausages were wrapped up in a little package and Dinah hurried out with them.

You never saw such a merry shadow as Knarf. He was perfectly delighted that his prank had worked so well. But Hanid didn't say a word. She just smiled. And this was strange because she might have tried to tell Dinah what was wrong. But she didn't. She just smiled.

"Oh, how Dinah's mother will scold when she sees instead of the pound of steak, a dozen sausages," Knarf cried in delight as the little girl hastened into the house. There was Mother waiting for her.

"Ah, that's fine," Mother said to Dinah. "I'm glad you returned so quickly with the—"

At this instant a most curious thing took place. Hanid, with a final smile at Knarf, suddenly sprang upon Mother's shoulder and whispered: "—the dozen sausages!"

"I'm glad you returned to quickly with the—with the dozen sausages," said Mother, not realizing that a new thought had been put into her head.

And of course she was delighted to find Dinah did have sausages, for that is just what she thought she had sent her out to buy. And there was no scolding at all, not a bit.

Oh Knarf was a tricky shadow, but Hanid was a wise shadow—a very, very wise shadow!
