GOOD-NIGHT STORIES

By Max Trell

The Shadow-Children Learn Why the Ostrich and Zebra Are Friends.

After their first visit inside the Natural History book, Mij, Flor, Hanid, Yam and Knarf—the five little shadow-children with the turned-about names—were eager to go again. To go inside the book meant just that and nothing less. They gave a spring and—whisk, they were inside. Shadow-children, you see, are not at all like real-children, who must be satisfied with merely looking inside a book.

Well, one evening they found the Natural History book lying open on the library-table. On one side was a page full of printed words and on the opposite side was a large picture. They stood on the bottom margin and peered closely at the picture, which showed a zebra and an ostrich standing together in a sunny meadow near a forest. The zebra seemed to be sniffing, while his friend held its head up as though it suspected someone was coming and was trying to see just who it was.

Now, the more the shadow-children looked at this picture, the more odd did it seem to be. Why should a zebra, which is a sort of striped donkey, be on the same picture with an ostrich, which is a bird?

"We'd better go right inside the picture and ask them ourselves," Flor said. All agreed that was sensible, except Knarf.

"I'm going to stay right here until I read it all!" he said. So they left him to pore over the long words while they all held hands and sprang into the picture. At first the zebra and the ostrich were greatly frightened. When they saw, however, that the shadow-children did not mean to harm them, they let them approach.

"Why is it," Hanid began in a polite voice, "that you two are friends?"

The two creatures looked at each other in good-natured amusement. Then the ostrich said: "We're friends because we help each other in times of danger. I have a very poor sense of smell, but my eyes are as sharp as an eagle's. My friend Zebra, on the other hand, is very near-sighted, but his sense of smell is extremely keen. So with my eyes and his nose, no one can catch us."

Just then a strange thing happened. Knarf, who finally made out what the words meant—which was exactly what the others had learnt already—determined to play a trick on the two odd friends. He decided to leap upon the zebra's back before either of them saw or smelt him coming. He slipped through the corner of the picture and crept stealthily along the ground, half hidden in the tall grass.

As you well know, a shadow has no scent. The zebra, therefore, did not sniff him, while the ostrich, though it saw a moving shadow plainly enough, paid no attention to it.

"Yes," the zebra was saying, "no one can come here without our knowing it"—when all at once Knarf, with a wild shout, leaped upon the zebra's back.

"I fooled you! I fooled you!" he cried.

His joy was short-lived. The zebra whirled around in fright, kicking up with its hind legs and dashing up and down. As for the ostrich it pranced around equally excited, finally snapping up the unfortunate shadow-boy in its beak and with a furious toss of its head, flinging him clear out of the page.

The other shadow-children found him lying half in an ink-well.

"I fooled them anyway!" he kept saying.
