CHARLES ROBERTS ACTING CASHIER AT GLENDALE BANK

(News-Review Douglas County Special)
GLENDALE, Sept. 21.—C. E. Roberts of Roseburg, who has been associated with the tax office at the county seat for many years, is in Glendale and will serve as cashier at the Glendale State bank while Glenn I. Wardrip takes a vacation. Wardrip has been looking forward to a hunting trip on upper Cow Creek, ever since last fall, and with a party of friends from Los Angeles, is all set to go. Now if our worthy governor will only lift the ban on deer hunting within the next few days it will be a real vacation for Wardrip. An owl in the woods back of Wardrip's home has been phopheysing rain for the past two weeks but nothing has come of it so far and Wardrip has lost faith in this owl. Maybe it is a young owl that does not quite know his business.

Blue Blood And Red by ROBERT TERRY SHANNON

WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE
 Eddie Regan has been persuaded to join a gang of which the "Big Guy" is the leader. Bernice Vereesi, "gang girl," is in love with Eddie, but he becomes disgusted with his life and flees. Boarding a freight train, he goes to Virginia, where he meets Marian Thornidike and Penfield Partridge. Partridge, the last member of an aristocratic Southern family, dies and leaves Eddie all his possessions. Eddie determines to make good and bridge the gulf which he realizes yawns between himself and Marian Thornidike. After a hard day's work on the farm he is sitting, reading, when Marian stumbles into the room, having been thrown from her horse. Eddie's solitude convinces Marian that he is in love with her.

CHAPTER XII
 She smiled vaguely. "I think I am suffering more from humiliation than anything else. It seems so silly to fall off a horse. I'm jured and bruised a bit, but I am sure there's nothing wrong with me worse than a blinding headache."

An urge of sympathy moved through Eddie. He was so interested in the girl that he had, honestly, forgotten her suggestion that he telephone her father.

"Maybe I can help you some," he said, his heart beating a little faster. "There's a trick I picked up from a guy that used to train prize fighters. Sometimes it does the work better than a headache powder—it's something like massage."

"If my head would only stop hurting," she replied, "I think I'd be all right."

He went behind her chair and his own hands touched her forehead, moved with steady, soothing pressure over her temple and back of her ears. At his first touch she seemed to relax.

"That is very restful," she said. "Don't talk," he cautioned her. After the passage of minutes she said, "I feel ever so much better."

Yet she did not so much stop. The touch of his hands was pleasant to her, and actually more penetrating than mere tranquility. She allowed herself to slip into an unthinking repose, while the warm, magnetic strength of his fingers flowed through the pain and began to drive it away. Gradually, she grew used to the almost seductive pressure; she threw off a feeling of strangeness, and allowed the easement of her suffering to be replaced by a drowsy balm of comfort.

"You must be tired," she murmured, sleepily.

But he did not answer her, nor had she expected an answer.

Presently, when he stopped, her eyes were closed. She was peaceful and motionless. He moved away from her soft-footedly, and was careful lest he make disturbing sounds.

A new peculiar happiness ran through him warmly. He had been privileged to touch her and the contact had been vastly more potent than any spoken utterance that would have been possible; the sensation of her smooth skin under his firm fingers had brought them both to some new frontier of feeling.

When he had desired to give voice to his love, he had lacked the offensory. By daring words, he would have shocked her and driven her from him. Instinctively, he had chosen the only course. . . .

He had left his future with her still open. Above all, he was afraid he might shock her and in his crudity tear down the fragile temple he had built in his dreams. If he had tried to tell her how he felt, his words would have appealed only to her mind, and her mind, inevitably, would have rejected him. He was a stranger, and not, on the surface, her kind of a man. In her eyes he was still a hazzard.

Yes, despite everything, she was coming under his sway. Subtly, he had begun to reach her in the old, primitive way—neither divined the significance of the alighting bird that was beginning to take form.

The twilight in the room deepened and Marian, reposing comfortably in the worn upholstery of the chair, did not stir. So far as Eddie could tell, she had drifted into a light slumber and he remained, with a cat-like carefulness, from making noise.

It was remarkable to him that she had, apparently, fallen asleep under the magnetic touch of his hands, and he suspected that she was only resting with her eyes closed. If this were true, he was immensely flattered that she could feel so secure and at ease along with him in his darkened house. But he was disturbed lest the situation become so unconventional that she would carry away an indefinite feeling of guilt, and so be under a future feeling of restraint. In his enamored state he attributed to her a fineness of feeling that amounted—had he been correct—to snobbishness.
