GOOD-NIGHT STORIES

By Max Trel

Knarf Helps His Master "Finish" a Composition.

How was Knarf to know that things were going to happen so suddenly? He had tried his best to be helpful. Goodness knows he deserved a better reward than he got.

This is how it all came about. Knarf, Mij, Flor, Hand and Yarn—the five little shadow-children with the turned-about names—were sitting on the edge of the library table watching Frank, Knarf's master, write a composition. Now, Master Frank, my dears, was not very fond of compositions. In fact, if the truth must be told, he thoroughly hated them. It was not the least surprising, therefore, that when he was asked quite joyfully to "have no more ink!"

When Knarf's lady boss checked contentedly, "If I have no more ink I can't think my composition today," he said, peering once more into the empty inkwell. Then he fetched a deep sigh and pretended to be very sad. "If only I had ink!" he sighed. "If only I had ink!"

The shadow-children who heard all this very well looked at each other in dismay. "What can we do?" they said. "Where shall we find ink?" Then they shook their heads.

All at once Knarf broke in. "I know where! Just come with me and I'll show you." They couldn't believe, so he led them across the library table, over the typewriter and up to the top of the bookcase. Just then he was expected to find ink. At length he stopped in front of a open book and said: "We'll find ink in there."

It was the natural history book and was open to a picture showing a little creature with long arms like an octopus. It was under water. Beneath the picture were the words: "This is a squid." They gazed at it closely. No ink did they see, however.

"Why," Hand said, turning to Knarf, "there's no ink here—only a little animal!"

"Oh, yes there is," the shadow-boy replied. And he pointed to a sentence on the other page. The sentence read as follows: "The squid contains a black fluid which is used for ink."

"There, you see," Knarf said triumphantly. "Now all we have to do is to borrow some." And with those words he gave a little spring and, strange to say, landed inside the picture. He waved to the others to follow him, which they instantly did. They found themselves at the bottom of the ocean, right next to the squid, which was lying on a flat stone.

"Good morning," Knarf said to the squid, "may I borrow a little ink?"

"Hi-m!" the squid replied. "I'm just about to write a book letter. How much do you want?"

"Just a few drops," Knarf said. "My master's composition is half-finished."

"All right," the squid said. "I can spare that much. Here they are." And as it said this it drew the black drops through a little funnel in front of its head. As this moment Hand suddenly cried in alarm: "Goodness gracious, we've forgotten to bring something to catch it in. We'll all be black as ink. We must jump!"

The jumping came just in time for Mij, Flor, Hand and Yarn. With a spring they jumped out of the picture. But poor Knarf was too late. In an instant the black drops spread all about him like a cloud of soot; and he turned pitch black. So started was he that he jumped with all his might and landed—of all places!—right on his master's pen-point just as he was telling his mother: "See, ma, I can't think my composition today because I have no more ink. Then he gave his pen a great shake, just to show her there wasn't a single drop left, and off fell the miserable ink-splashed sheet of paper into the composition, leaving a huge ragged-edged blot."

"Good!" said the boy. "Now I'll have to do the whole thing over again!"
