GOOD-NIGHT STORIES

By Max Trel

The Shadow-Children Embark on a Mediterranean Cruise.

MJ, Flor, Hand, Yum and Knarf—the five little shadow-children with the turned-about names—were waiting for a carriage. They were in a strange city. The little real-children—their masters and mistresses—were all carrying little satchels. And there was also a trunk.

As you could not for the world guess where they were I shall have to tell you. They were in a carriage leaving Jaffa, which is a town on Palestine, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. The Mediterranean, my dears, is big enough to be an ocean. You can not, no matter how strong your eyes may be, see to the other side.

The shadow-children, you understand, were accompanying the real-children, who, in turn, were accompanying their mother and father.

"We're going in a Rowboat," said the mother, "and you can go with us."

"We won't get to Vienna in a hurry," said Knarf. "Carriages can't go very fast."

Hand turned to Knarf and laughed. "Silly," she said. "We don't go by carriage at all. We go by boat."

Knarf tried to act as though he didn't hear her. Soon they came to the dock. The boat wasn't in the dock.

"There," said Knarf, turning to Hand, "where's the boat?"

For a moment Hand was puzzled. Then Yum shouted: "There it is!"

There looked a large rowboat pulled up to the dock. Five dark-skinned men wearing red fezzes were rowing.

"Ooh!" MJ said, "we're going to Vienna in a rowboat. That will be sport!"

Hand shook her head doubtfully. "I didn't seem just right to her. Still, that was just what they wanted to be doing. Father and mother and the five children got into the boat, bag and baggage, and the dark-skinned men started rowing them out to sea. The men all stood up in the boat as they rowed.

"Will it take very long?" asked Flor timidly. He didn't like the way the boat was tossing.

"It will take days and—Hand began, when suddenly she interrupted herself. "We won't be in this boat more than five minutes more!" She pointed straight ahead. They followed her finger and saw for the first time a steamer lying at anchor. They had not noticed it before because it had been partly hidden by a steep hill which extended out into the water.

Sure enough, just as Hand said, they rowed straight for the steamer and in five minutes they reached the side where a long flight of stairs reached down from the upper deck almost to the level of the water. The rowboat drew up close to this flight of stairs and one by one the real-children, then Mother and Father went up the stairs. Finally the shadow-children followed along, although no one noticed them. They were used to not being noticed, and didn't mind it in the least. In fact they even enjoyed it. It was like being invisible.

At length after the boatmen were paid and the baggage all stowed neatly away in the staterooms, the whole family came up on deck to watch the ship get under way.

They heard the first-mate shout orders to the sailors. Then an immense machine on deck started turning round and round, and came to a stop at the end of a thick iron chain.

Hand turned to the others. "Now we're going to—"

"—to VIENNA!" Knarf and MJ shouted in unison.

The clever little shadow girl shook her head. "You two don't know any geography at all," she sighed. "I shall have to give you a lesson at once. Don't you know you can't get to Vienna by boat?"

MJ looked startled. "Oh, Knarf," she smiled, "of course I know it. I said it just to see if you knew it too."

No one could get the better of Knarf.
