WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE

Eddie Regan, once a member of a New York gang, has escaped and gone to Virginia, where he has friends. Penfield Partridge, who dies and leaves all his possessions to Eddie. Eddie had been in love with Bernice Veressi, "gang girl," but all thought of her is put out of his heart when he meets and falls in love with Marian Thorndike. Eddie declares his love for Marian, but she discourages him and tells him she expects to marry Tom Freeman. Freeman dislikes Eddie, and one afternoon when Eddie is calling on Marian Freeman comes in and insults Eddie. Marian tells Eddie it is hopeless for him to love her, and Eddie, discouraged, decides to go to Richmond. While he is there he meets Mike Arno, a former member of the gang. Arno tells him that Bernice is still in love with him (Eddie) and Eddie's thoughts once more swing to her. Eddie tells Mike of his love for Marian and Mike informs him he is not fitted for country life and is a "sap".

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY
CHAPTER XXVIII

It was useless to expect Mike Arno to comprehend the angle of real love, and Eddie gave up trying to explain. Six months ago he would have agreed with a perfect word Arno said—but it was all different now. He had seen a vision that says like Arno simply could not get.

"Let's not talk about it any more, Mike."

"All right, Eddie. Some day you'll realize that I had the right dope. You've got a real girl waiting for you in New York—Bernice's been through the mill and, for a guy like you, she's perfect. I'd grab her off myself but there's not a chance in the world. If you hook up with me we could make all kinds of jack—but that's over too, I guess."

"That stuff," Eddie said with a tone of finality, "is out with me forever. But that doesn't mean I am panning up my old friends, Mike. I'd like to hear from you sometimes—dope me a letter."

Before they parted he gave Mike Arno his address, but this was more politeness than anything else. Never again, he realized, more poignantly than ever, would his path go along with Mike's, or anybody like him. They parted after dinner and Eddie spent the night in the hotel. For the first time in weeks he did not sleep easily; his ears had become unused to the night noises of the city and he was constantly disturbed by street cars and automobiles. When he took the train the next day for the country he felt truly that he was going home, the only real home on earth he had ever had.

Meeting Mike Arno had given him a whiff once more of the old city life and it had stood out in vivid contrast against the quieter existence in the country. Eddie tried to look at the facts honestly—were it not for Marian would he have spurned Arno's insistent temptations? No use kidding himself. Except for Marian, he knew he would never spend another day on the farm. She was the magnet that drew him back. She was the light that illuminated his whole life for better or worse, for happiness or sorrow. Marian Thorndike was now and would ever be the heart and centre of his whole existence.

His mind was jaded from trying to solve his problem. She had practically given him the air—because he was not making anything out of himself.

Despite his worship of her, a tide of irritation swept him. "What on earth did she expect? A guy couldn't jump out and discover the North Pole or fly over the Atlantic just to make a girl feel swell about him! After all, he was nobody on earth but Eddie Regan and it was idiotic to figure himself as a hero or something like that."

"Be yourself, kid," he muttered, with the strangely accurate philosophy of the curb stone. This kernel of truth, somehow, began to comfort him—if he couldn't win Marian in his own proper, genuine person it was silly to think she'd fall for him if he pumped up a lot of artificial pretenses. She didn't know herself what she wanted him to do.

With renewed force it came back to him that the main purpose in life was to stay alive and be in love. Any job, any profession, any ambition was merely a top-dressing.

Being once more in the Penfield Partridge home, Eddie was conscious of a deep, inner repose. The old furniture with its time-mellowed surfaces soothed him and was balm to his troubled spirit. It was as though some ripe and beneficent kindness was imprisoned in the close-grained polish of the wood; his finger tips touched a mahogany table and a quiet current of well-being flowed into his nerves. Things like old furniture and silver candlesticks belonged to the life of Marian Thorndike—they belonged to his life, too. A yearning to see her again assailed him with a tide that blurred out everything else from his consciousness.

The telephone rang and old Toke answered it.
"Miss Marian wants to speak to you, sah."

There was a swirl of acute sensation in Eddie's breast as he answered the telephone. That Marian should call him up startled him, excited him with a swift rush of delight. Her dear voice over the wire was warm and friendly.

"I didn't really expect to catch you at home," she said. "My cook heard you had gone away—and I thought maybe your Toke could tell me what had become of you. And now I catch you at home yourself—it's rather silly, isn't it?"

"It's wonderful," he breathed. "I thought maybe you were going away for good," she told him, half laughing.

"I went up to Richmond to buy some things. I'm never going away for good—I am going to live here all my life."

"Well, I'm glad you didn't run away from us, anyway." Her voice, he thought, was flattery.

"I was a little worried—so I took the trouble to call up."
