STUDY OF DIABETES DISCLOSES NEW AID

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9.—(AP)—Raw starches, in the form of uncooked vegetables, are foreseen as a possible substitute for insulin in the treatment of mild diabetes.

After two years of research, Dr. S. M. Rosenthal, pharmacologist of the hygienic laboratory, U. S. public health service, has found that raw starches may be eaten without an appreciable rise in blood sugar. The effect of insulin, which is injected, is to keep the quantity of sugar from rising in a patient's blood after a meal. Further tests are being carried out to determine whether raw vegetables, taken as a part of the meal, will not be as effective as insulin.

Raw starches, red both to normal and diabetic patients in the form of uncooked carrots, turnips, onions, tomatoes, radishes, and some nuts, were found to prevent the rise in blood sugar. Research is progressing to determine whether the use of insulin can be avoided in cases where it has been injected once or twice a day. Promising results have rewarded the work, said Dr. Rosenthal, but he definite conclusion has been reached.

Dr. Rosenthal's discovery came as a byproduct of a study of digestion. He cautioned that the raw starches will not act as a cure, no more than insulin, but will be valuable in the treatment.

Complete House Furnishers

Roseburg, Ore.

"Into the dining house Mr. Smallweed leads the way. They order oval and ham and French beans. . . . Then amid a coming in, and going out, and running about, and a clatter of crockery, and a rumbling up and down of the machine which brings the rice cuts from the kitchen, and a shrill crying for more rice cuts down the speaking pipe, and a shrill reckoning of the cost of the nice cuts . . . and a considerable heated atmosphere . . . the legal triumvirate appease their appetites."

—BLEAK HOUSE.

"MR. SMALLWEED LEADS THE WAY"

THE pleasures of the table are nowhere better described than in the writings of that master novelist, Charles Dickens. His jolly, sumptuous feasts provide some of the most kingly delights to be had in all English literature.

Where is there a man whose imagination is so dead, whose digestion so poor, that he cannot find his appetite mounting in the atmosphere of that hearty solicitor's dinner in "Bleak House" . . . who would not wish to join that happy company—partake of their food, and drink and conversation?

Good living. Good eating. Good fellowship. They are sought by all people, in all times and all places. Today we have the opportunity of enjoying it in FRYE'S DELICIOUS BRAND HAMS AND BACON . . . so smacking good that Mr. Smallweed and his compatriots might well have wished they'd swung overhead in their taverns of Merrie England those hundred years ago.
