mission?" MJ begged.

"The bee shook its head. 'No,' it said. 'I'm only the nursemaid. You will have to speak to the queen.'"

By this time quite a crowd of bees, buzzing angrily, had collected around the shadow-children.

One of the bees led them around the comb to a little corridor. Just off the main hive and there they found the queen. She wasn't sitting on a throne nor did she have a crown on her head. She was just an enormous bee. She looked up as they entered.

"Your Majesty," the bee said, "they want some queen-honey."

"Hm," said the queen. "How much?"

"Just a taste," MJ replied.

The queen thought about this a little while, then she said to the bee: "I guess we can spare a taste. Tell nurse to bring in five tasters."

The bee left and a moment later in came the nursemaid with five tasters of queen-honey on a leafy-platter.

"Sit down," the queen told the children, "and make yourselves comfortable. I wish I could serve you cookies, but the cook of the house where you live forgot to put them out on the windowsill this morning, so none of my people could get them. You'd do me a great favor if you reminded her each morning. She's terribly forgetful."

"We surely will," Hauld said.

"My, what delicious honey this is!" MJ exclaimed.

"It's our very best brand," said the queen.

"Won't you give us the recipe?" Yarn asked.

At this the queen grew suddenly very solemn. "Oh, no—I couldn't possibly do that. It's a secret," she said. "And besides, if you knew how to make it, you'd all turn into queen-bees. A taste now and then does no harm. But what should you do if you all turned in to queen-bees? No, you had better not know it. Ordinary honey is quite good enough."

"Yes," said MJ, sorrowfully, "when you get plenty of it. But you never do."

The queen didn't appear to hear him. "Come again some time," she said in a sleepy voice. And the shadow-children, understanding that no more honey was to be expected, took their leave.
