City's Growth Needs Loyalty

"Bill" Dohar spent a busy day yesterday with the people of this community who had been taking advantage of the special offerings in most of the stores. Up to the present time "Bill" has passed through the hands of many local merchants in the regular course of business and each one has made a legitimate profit from him.

"This condition can keep up until I pass through the hands of all the local merchants," said "Bill," and as long as I remain in Roseburg under the care of loyal citizens I will work for them and build anything they want me to, for my power for good is unlimited in Roseburg. The thousands of other Bills that are circulating here will work in the same way if properly guided.

"From all that I can hear," continued "Bill," "Roseburg is destined to become a good sized distributing center, but the consummation of its hopes will be delayed if people persist in buying goods away from Roseburg when they can be obtained here.

"Money that is earned in Roseburg by either employers or employees and kept circulating at home will establish the business and manufacturing plants that could be used to such good advantage in this city now.

"The cycle of a home working dollar is a small one if it is treated fairly. The employee gets it, spends it with the local merchant, who buys his goods from wholesale houses in this city, where possible, and they in turn pay it out as salaries. The employee banks part of it and the money is invested in substantial projects or at home, in turn giving employment to many other employees who come here to take a place in the new industries.

"On the other hand, the cycle of a disloyal dollar is short. The employee gets it and because he is all ways under the impression that things are cheaper somewhere else sends it away to some other city and neither the local merchant, wholesaler nor banker gets the good of it, and the other city gets 'Bill' Dohar and puts him to work in his own community.

"Or, to put the matter in another way, do not think of money as a commodity, for it is only a medium for the exchange of commodities (either goods or labor). Under proper conditions, a man who pays out money does not part with anything; he merely gives up something that he has received for value in some other previous transaction, and receives value back again.

"In other words, all through this life, he gives up commodity for money in endless chain. The money itself is nothing more than the wagon that delivers the goods.

"So long as the circle is unbroken—goods for money and money for goods—the balance of trade so far as this man is concerned is maintained. He has not only a place in which to sell, for the money is at hand to serve as the medium way.

"But suppose he has a commodity and pays money therefor. And suppose a little later he has a commodity.
