GOOD NIGHT STORIES By Max Trelle

The Shadow Children Visit Salzburg and Knarf is Disappointed. "Anyone can see as plain as day that it's a saltberg," Knarf exclaimed.

"No," said Mij, Flor, Hamid and Yam, "It looks just like the lights of a city."

And the shadow children with the turned-about names could not make out whether it was one of the other. It was an extremely curious question.

The shadows, you remember, were travelling around the world with their masters and mistresses, the little real-children. They were on the train to Salzburg, which (if you have studied your geography) you will know is in Austria, when Knarf made a surprising discovery—at least, he thought it was a surprising discovery. He announced that Salzburg was not, as everyone thought, a city, but a saltberg (for, as he, "salt means salt in German, and burg means town").

He pictured it as a sort of tall white mountain, exactly like an iceberg, except that it was salt. Climbing all over it were people with salt shakers. These they filled up and took home to dinner. Brooks ran down the sides, carrying salt water to the ocean.

Hamid, who was an extremely clever little shadow-girl, pictured it quite differently. She said that Salzburg had nothing to do with saltberg, which didn't exist even, but was simply a city. She said it was called Salzburg because it was near some salt mines.

On getting off the train they found that it was Hamid who was right. Salzburg was simply a city. In vain did Knarf search for saltberg. There was nothing that resembled one save a high mountain. But it was plain that the mountain was formed out of rock, as mountains generally are.

The city, Knarf found out to his disappointment, was famous because it was the birthplace of the great composer, Mozart.

"Humph!" the shadow-boy remarked. "I never even heard of him."

"He's one of the most famous composers that ever lived," Hamid said. "He was born 200 years ago."

"He must be a very old man now," said Mij.

"Oh, he's not living now. When he was six years old he played so well on the piano that he was brought before the Emperor to give a performance. The Emperor was delighted. He could hardly believe that so small a boy could play so beautifully. Then Mozart traveled all over the world, giving concerts. And he became famous everywhere. Later, when he became a little older, he composed music."

Salzburg was an exceedingly quaint town. It was all narrow, winding streets, along which were tall, old-fashioned buildings. There was a river and a magnificent flower garden called Mirabelle Park. In the centre of which were statues and a fountain. On the hill in back of the town was a high bell tower. There were a score of bells. Each bell sounded a different note. When they were rung they played a tune. On the very top of the hill was an old castle. From the roof they saw the view for miles around. They saw all around them the mighty Alps.

"Salzburg is a very, very beautiful city," Mij, Flor, Hamid and Yam agreed. But Knarf couldn't get over his disappointment about the saltberg.

"I don't think much of it at all," he said. "It's nothing like I thought it would be."

And that, you see, was true. (Copyright, 1929, Newspaper Feature Service, Inc.)
