GOOD-NIGHT STORIES

By Max Trel

Mr. Canary Gets a New Singing Pup—and a Meal!

Knarf had the best intentions in the world. But that was just the way with him. When his intentions were good, things always turned out badly.

It happened like this. Knarf, Mr. Flor, Hanid and Yam—the five little shadow-children with the turned-about names—were sitting in the garden one afternoon with the little real-children, their masters and mistresses, when they heard a curious sound. It went something like this: Zee-ep, zee-ep, zee-ep.

"What's that?" Yam wanted to know.

"It's a cricket," said Hanid.

"What does zee-ep mean?" inquired Flor.

"Oh, it means a great deal. It means hello, and good-morning, and howdy-do and looks-like-rain, and where-are-you-going, and here-lam and have-you-had-your-dinner-yet, and—"

But the shadows were staring at it in such astonishment that they forgot to sing. It thought it had done something wrong. Of course, that wasn't the case at all. The shadows were amazed to learn that three simple little sounds could mean so much.

"How can you ever tell just which of all those meanings you mean?" Hanid asked, on finding her tongue again.

"It's all in the way we sing. Loud means one thing, soft means another, slow means a third, fast means a fourth, and so on."

Knarf wasn't at all impressed. "Still," he said, "you ought to learn how to sing more sweetly. Would you like to take lessons?"

"Oh, sir, I'd love to! Of whom could I?"

"Of the canary. Come with me. I'll introduce you to him. He'll be delighted to teach you. He has nothing to do all day but sing."

"Does he live nearby? Mother told me he was sure not to go too far."

"He lives in a cage right near the parlor window. All you have to do is hop in through the window and you are there."

"Are you sure he won't mind?"

"Not at all. He'll be delighted. I tell you. And with that he started off, urging the cricket to follow him, which it did a little hesitantly. Mr. Flor, Hanid and Yam looked at each other in dismay. They knew that whenever Knarf began anything of this sort, something always went wrong.

"You'd better not go," they called after the cricket. It was too late. It had already hopped in through the parlor window after the shadow-boy. Then it followed him between the bars of the canary's cage. "This is cricket," Knarf said to Mr. Canary. "He wants to take singing lessons of you."

"Oh, he does, does he?" Mr. Canary said, his black eyes gleaming hungrily. "I'll be glad to teach him. I'm sure he'll make a very pleasant pupil. Just let me hear you sing."

"Zee-ep, zee-ep, zee-ep."

"Very good," Mr. Canary said. But the cricket made no response. And that wasn't odd, because the canary had just gobbled him up.

"What Does Zee-ep Mean?"

The sound kept coming closer and closer, in little hops. By and by, Knarf exclaimed: "There it is!" He pointed toward a clump of grasses. There was the cricket, sure enough, standing on a blade of grass.

"Zee-ep, zee-ep, zee-ep!" it said.

"What are you zee-eping about?" asked Knarf.

"Oh, sir, I'm not zee-eping," the cricket replied. "I'm singing."

"Singing? Do you call that singing?"

It nodded. "Yes, sir. I hope I'm not being too bold, sir," it said timidly. It was a very young cricket, you see. It was the first time it had ever been out alone.

"It's a bit monotonous," Mr. Knarf said. "Can't you sing anything else but zee-ep, zee-ep, zee-ep?"

"I never learned anything else. I'm the song my mother taught me. She told me all the best crick-
