GOOD-NIGHT STORIES

By Max Trel

Knaif's Curious Streak Gets Him into the Butter Dish.
Why did Knaif do it? Who can say. But it was very like him to do it—very like him, indeed.

It was while the children were having dinner that it happened. There were the five real children and their shadows. The shadows were MJ, Flor, Hanid, Yam, and Knaif. Spell their names, backwards and you'll know the names of their masters and mistresses.

With shadows, as with children, there are two kinds—the good and the bad. MJ, Flor, Hanid and Yam were good. Knaif, as you know, was bad.

"Help! Help!" Knaif shouted. "I can't get out of this butter dish! It's so hot! It's so hot!"

When the children are having dinner it is usual for their shadows to stay behind them, generally upon the wall or under the chairs. It was all very well for the others to do this, but for Knaif it wasn't to be thought of. He must be right in the midst of things. So he made himself as small as the prong of a fork, and, taking a spring, caught onto the fringe of the tablecloth and pulled himself over the edge. Once on the table he skipped over the breadknife and ran straight to his master's place.

The other shadows watched him in consternation. "Come, come back!" they called. But he paid no attention to them. Oh, he was a bad one, he was.
