GOOD-NIGHT STORIES

By Max Trefl

The Shadow-Children Hear the Sweet Song of the Sugar Lumps. Yarn and the four other shadow-children with the turned-about names—Mij, Flor, Hanid and Knarf—were walking around the top of the table one day when—
"Oh, indeed, they could walk around the top of the table! They were only shadows, you see, and shadows can walk around the top of anything, even a pin, without anyone being the wiser."
Well, they were walking around the top of the table when they heard a chorus of sweet little voices. Being clever, the shadow-children immediately glanced inside the sugar-bowl and there be-

"What Are You Doing Here?" held three little lumps of sugar singing away. Two were whole lumps and the third was only a half.
"Sweet-sweet-sweet! We're all so sweet, so good and sweet, sweet-sweet-sweet!"
They were singing. They stopped when they heard the shadows. They were all so nice and square, with broad, sparkling white faces. Sitting astride the ear of the bowl was a silver sugar-lump. It paid no attention to what the little lumps were saying. Instead it kept watching its sharp claw, of which it was exceedingly proud. "Good-morning," Hanid greeted the sugars.

"Good-morning," they echoed sweetly.

"What are you all doing here?" asked Knarf.

"Oh, sir, we belong here. Besides, we were put here by the mistress of the house. This is our home. We're going to stay here for a long, long time, unless—"

They hesitated awkwardly.

"Unless what?" inquired Ym.

"—unless we should be picked up by the claws of that gentleman sitting there," the half-lump whispered, trying to point to the tongue.

Of course, it couldn't point as it had no fingers.

"Oh, you shouldn't be afraid of him," the shadow-girl said. "He cannot hurt you. He just takes you from one place to another. Everyone with good table-manners uses him. He's much better than fingers."

They seemed much relieved when they heard this.

"And where does he take us to?"

"That all depends. Sometimes us to the tea, sometimes it's to the coffee, or the chocolate."

"How nice!" they exclaimed.

"How very, very nice. Now we know where all our comrades have gone to. They must like it, too, for they always stay there."

"Tea is very good—especially when it's sweet," Knarf put in.

"But it might not be so good for you," Hanid began. She didn't have time for another word. At this moment the tea-pots were set on the table and filled with hot tea. Then down came the sugars.

"Take me, take me!" shouted the half-lump. But the two wholes were taken instead. Into the hot tea they were dropped, their square faces beaming with pleasure, for they were quite happy. In fact, they actually melted with joy.

As for the poor half-lump, so disappointed was it at being overlooked that it dashed itself against the side of the bowl until it broke into bits and had to be fed to the canary.
