The Masked Hostess

By Blair Stephenson

CHAPTER XVIII.

"Well, one must be getting on, what? Mustn't be late where one's dining. The unpardonable sin, that. See you at midnight, yes? Right-o."

She was unable to speak at all.

He walked to the door of the room ahead of her ,and along the hall leading from it to the farther door leading out of the house. The groom who had his horse was holding it there. She heard him speak to the man, then the horse's hoofs go in quick leaps along the carriage sweep to the road outside. There rider and horse turned and were gone in a furious gallop of which the rhythm-beat sounded in her ears unceasingly till she saw him again.

Fairmount (Monty) Delaine, hopeful and high-hearted scion of the land poor Delaines, was the first guest on the ground as the high clock in the hall of The Firs struck the hour of midnight.

He came with his host, Stefano having picked him up at Piping Rock and taken him along in his car as a buffer to have between him and Nathalie when they should meet again after their hour of deep emotion in the early evening.

Stefano was, as usual, truly his own man. His eyes rested a little hungrily on Nathalie for the smallest part of a second; then roved away again.

Nathalie, in flame color and with a Spanish comb in her hair, bit at her carmined lips as Stefano came in. Then she too had herself in hand and turned gaily to Monty Delaine, who at once demanded a pick-me-up.

He had had a hard day, he said. Those who knew him well understood when he described a day thus that he had been inebriateu and sobered several times in the course of it. He was in one of his practically sober phases as he talked to Nathalie, the open car ride with Stefano having, as he explained cheerfully, "aerated" his brain.

"Take it from old Monty — a grilling business day. Met a man at Mineola, head all clear, at nine o'clock. Hard-boiled egg. Looks like a bootlegger, but a real estate man. Tough baby. Bears watching. Had ham and eggs with him —then a few drinks. Heard his proposition. Nothing good enough. A few more drinks and got down to brass tacks. Better proposition from him but still not good enough by thirty thousand dollars. So business being temporarily laid aside we had a couple more drinks and then a deadliest last and the meeting adjourned. Says he'll be back in two days and means it. I never do business except on a clear head. Here's how Ramon—looking at you, Senora. Drink it down."

Yet for all his variegated day his linen was spotless and his dress jacket as though it had just come from his valet—he had none—and though he was saturated in alcohol he was kindly and humorous and charming. Subsequently as the night went forward he moved up beside Nathalie several time, "needn't be 'fraid of her, I'm tive memory of some hard drinkers —and reminded her to beware of Mrs. Pemberton Swayne and not get in too close quarters with her. "But remember," he insisted each time, "need'nt be 'fraid of her. I'm behind you."

Nathalie's mask was taken as a matter of course on this second night of her hostess-ship and as a flood tide of guests poured in from right after midnight she was again the ruling star in the firmament of them. The crowd was much the same as the night before, the two girls she had seen carried to their cars that morning being among the first to appear. Both were as fresh and fair looking as thought their night preceding had been spent in nursery play. Two minutes after they were in the house each had a stiff highball in her hand.

Stefano's general invitation of the night before had apparently been relayed in all directions, for there were many new faces and about half of them, as on the preceding night, those of people Nathalie knew well. Some of them were related to her, if not closely. Many were of families intermarried with her own family or with collateral branches of it. But of them all not a single soul beheld her with the eyes of recognition.

But she knew, from the eyes which watched her and from the expressions of faces and scraps of talk which were hushed when she moved within hearing of them, that she was the high topic of discussion and that the novelty and mystery of her would increase with every fresh night of her appearance. People who are bred alike know their own. In the manner of everyone there was concession to the comprehension that she was no professional dancer nor hired entertainer—but of their own stripe, whatever her identity or nationality.

The dancing floors were jammed by two o'clock, the musicians at their apex and the trays of liquors being borne steadily in and out. It was then she began to wonder if Stefano was to be her partner at all or if he was purposely avoiding asking her to dance. A girl near her mentioned the name of John Sloan, spoke it as though she knew him very well, and Nathalie turned swiftly to see who it was who had said it. But the girl was gone, in the whirl of the dance somewhere, and her interest in Sloan, whatever it might be, was not for Nathalie to know unless she would still be talking of him when she came dancing by again.

But his name reminded her of the fir trees hedged close about the house, and Monty Delaine, who was dancing with her, suddenly abandoning her and wandering unsteadily after a servant he saw with a tray of drinks, she slipped out of doors by a long window she knew of and which opened on a side of the house from a room which lay across the hall from the long rooms where the dancing couples thronged the floors.

It was dark and quiet on the rotting ground level balcony on which she stood. None of the headlights of the many cars parked everywhere in the grounds pierced to it for firs screened it close.

She told herself, as she stood in the dark tree scented air, that she was not thinking of Sloan, nor of Stefano, but only of the peace and dark and the stir of trees.

She felt rather than heard a step come through the window and new it would be Stefano.

He was standing beside her. She did not speak nor did he. He did not lay a hand on her nor move a trace nearer as they stood there, in the dark and alone with the trees above and before them and the crash of music behind them in the lighted house.

It was she who broke the spell of minutes, turning as if to pass him and go in. He stepped back, meaning to let her pass and trying to. But he could not. He touched her lightly and murmured, "Ah, no," as if to himself. Then she was in his arms.

He held her and until his lips touched her cheek she did not resist. Then she broke free and he let her go; but he was right behind her when she regained the hall and his hand was on her shoulder as she was revealed in the lights of the first of the dancing rooms. Swiftly his arms were about her again and he was dancing with her among the others.

They went around the room; and then around it again. Neither looked at the other. They were in a condition of content and tranquil happiness as complete as though they were still out under the firs, though dancers crowded them close and laughter and the clash of the band were all about them.

Some one staggered against Natalie. "Me, Senora," said a voice in her ear, Monty Delaine's "S'all right. I'm behind you."

"And I as well," said Stefano and pressed her. "In all honor and devotion. And may death take me if I fail in the last word of the one or of the other."
