A Kiss for Corinna

By MAY CHRISTIE

WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE
Denise Van Wyck, bored with the life of a debutante, meets Malvey Craig, a clerk in her wealthy uncle's employ, in an unconventional manner. She acknowledges a growing interest in the young man and confides her story, adding that she is to meet him for lunch, to Corinna Duran, operator in the beauty shop she patronizes. It so happens that Corinna also knows Malvey, and is, in fact, in love with him. Corinna is torn by jealousy and worry, and when she meets him that evening artfully questions him about his day. Malvey tells her about his meeting with Denise, but admits that he does not even know her name. Later on, Corinna again questions Malvey about Denise, and is forced to tell him that she suspects the identity of the girl. Her former silence on this subject annoys Malvey, and he leaves her that evening without making another appointment. Meanwhile Denise confides her story to her friend, the Countess de Santalves, and asks her to help her. The Countess promises to invite a famous singer to her home, in order that Denise may bring Malvey to hear him.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY
CHAPTER 12

In the rather gloomy splendor of Mr. Crisswell's dining room in the house on Long Island, Denise sat with her usual hostess.

It was a handsome room in dark oak paneling, with a lamp swung low over the table.

Mortimer ate little. If he had had his way, he would have slept his "jag" off in his bed upstairs.

But Denise had insisted.

"I can't stand a tete-a-tete with the old boy, and you've got to appear."

And, indeed, Mr. Crisswell was in irascible mood tonight, due to a bad turn of his dyspepsia.

Following on two pre-dinner teaspoonsful of olive oil, for his meal he was now attacking a melancholy rice pudding.

In the green shaded light that hung above the table, Mortimer looked sallow—almost ghost-like. The sight of the excellently cooked viands nauseated him.

Only Denise ate heartily. Despite the lobster and the frogs' legs and the custards she had consumed at the Park Lane at her lunch today, plus the five o'clock sandwiches and cocktails at her friend's apartment, she was again hungry. In her simple white frock in the dim light, she looked rather like a greedy little girl as she sat gobbling.

Mortimer felt peevish. So did his father, who said raspingly, between mouthfuls of milk pudding:

"One would think, to see you eat so heartily, that you'd really gone through an honest-to-goodness working day, Denise."

"Maybe I have." She made a small grimace at him that was intended to be arch and fascinating, but which missed its purpose. "We society buds are mighty busy, I can assure you. We dash from function to function, shedding sweetness and light about us."

"And being extraordinarily fat, such a colossal waste of time!"

"Dyspeptic darling!" With a lithic movement of her slim body in its white evening gown, Denise leaned across the vast expanse of polished table toward him. "Your brochiness isn't really from the head, it's from the tummy!"

Uncle Crisswell, however, had been hearing gossip about Denise's doings, and he was not easily placated.

"Out till all hours of the morning, dancing! Careening from roadhouse to roadhouse! Drinks in the car, and all flying around with Tom and Dick and Harry, till the dawn. Cheapening yourself! It's outrageous!"

Although accustomed to her uncle's moods, this attack was disconcerting. She flung a look at Mortimer to help her.

But Mortimer's head burned like a furnace and his brain felt like cotton wool this evening.

"You're early-Victorian, darling!" Denise blew a kiss to the critic from her carefully-manicured fingertips. "Almost B. C. in fact! Chaperons are extinct as the dodo and the younger generation just does as it fancies!"

That angered him. Denise really owed everything in the world to him. "From now on you'll do as I say. There's to be no 'out till dawn' with young men who haven't an iota of respect for you or any woman. And henceforth, your friends—these fellows who tout their horns outside for you—those lazy loafers—are to be presented to me personally!"

Denise pursed up her lips, but did not answer.

"All this drinking among you young women is disgusting," proceeded Mr. Crisswell. T/n, when the butler appeared: "No, Hawkins, I won't have any claret, neither will Miss Denise nor Mr. Mortimer."

After the meal was over Denise followed her uncle into his magnificent library, aglow with tall electric candles that made the young wisp of April moon pale in the sky. Her uncle was quite a dear at heart, she knew, and now she fussed about him, insisting that he take his after-dinner cup of coffee, despite doctor's instructions. She sat at his feet in little-girl fashion, and—after petting and fussing about him—finally said:

"You certainly were rather down on the young fellows I go around with, but you can't entirely blame me, since you don't invite the other kind—the worthwhile ones—to come to the house. There must be a lot of charming young men on the 'Street' who would make fascinating friends. I'm sure. For instance—" she fiddled with the tassel of his smoking jacket. "Isn't there a young chap in your office name of Malvey Craig?"

Mr. Crisswell looked taken aback. He took a sip of his coffee before he said: "Yes. A promising fellow—2-A KISS FOR CORINNA."

That was one of our floor telephone clerks. I promoted him myself. Have you met him, Denise?"

She smiled enchantingly, looking for the moment rather like a shy child.

"He lost his way coming here the other morning and I happened to meet him on the road. I directed him. We'd quite a chat. He seemed out of the ordinary. With lots of ideas. Very interesting."

"He's a clever boy. Ambitious, poised and clean-cut. If only Mortimer—his father sighed—"had one-quarter his keenness and common sense and working capacity, I'd be thankful!"

Denise's heart accelerated at these words of praise for Malvey.

A little breathlessly she said:

"If he is such a paragon, Uncle, and you think he would be a good influence for Mortimer, why don't you invite him down for a weekend, or for dinner one evening. I confess I'm sick and tired of the men I meet, and—tentatively and naively—"If we could have a few parties with interesting people here, I wouldn't be running around so much in the evenings."

At this psychological moment, Mortimer, still oppressed by his "hang-over," came blundering into the room. The penetrating eyes of Mr. Crisswell were turned on his son. The dissipated looks of the young man were not lost on him. He suggested, brusquely: "Mortimer, suppose you ask young Craig out here one evening."

Mortimer's slack mouth gaped.

"That chap from the office? What on earth for?"

"He's interesting and clever," said Denise.

"Ha! Ha! Sweet on him, are you?" mocked her cousin. "But nothing doing! The fellow's already got a wonderful girl."
