KING VIDOR, who has been called the Midas of the screen, inasmuch as whatever he touches during the filming of a production turns to box-office gold, directed Marion Davies in her new comedy, "Not So Dumb," which will open Sunday at the Antlers theatre.

The new talking picture is based upon the Broadway stage hit, "Dulcy," written by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly, in which Lynn Fontaine created the title characterization and which Constance Talmadge later portrayed on the silent screen. In adapting the play for the talkies, Wanda Tuchock, scenarist, and Edwin Justus Mayer, who prepared the dialogue, made very few alterations, preserving the flavor of the original plot.

Miss Davies is seen to advantage in demonstrating her rare comedy talents. As the beautiful-but-dumb fiancée of a young artificial jewelry merchant, she continually manages to mess up his business affairs by prying and meddling. Her scene as hostess at bridge is perhaps the most uproarious Miss Davies ever enacted.

"HALF MARRIAGE," story of mad Manhattan youth, adapted from George Kibbe Turner's magazine story, "Companionate," will open an engagement at the Liberty theatre Sunday and Olive Borden fans, who have followed her
