Business and Farms

CONTRARY to ideas held by many people who do not know conditions in business and in the present depression in the price of commodities and consequent losses affects all people. From the most struggling farmer to the greatest capitalist, losses are pretty much in proportion although some are in position to stand losses better than others.

Any assumption held by farmers or anyone else that the rest of the economic world is contriving against them is far from the fact. Under present conditions business of all sorts, including that of farming, becomes a serious struggle and no one element possesses any real advantage.

Independent factories, merchants and other commercial organizations, including banks, investment concerns, etc., are confronted with the formation of giant chain organizations in their respective fields. They combat this with a closer cooperation and the formation of cooperative buying organizations and voluntary chain connections of their own. The great chains themselves have their troubles. Their organizations have become huge and unwieldy. Their growth has been rapid. They more problem of employing capable men is perhaps the greatest menace to their successful existence. No commercial enterprise can feel certain right now of its unimpaired existence unless it is extremely alert and is capably and carefully managed.

There is probably a greater chance for assured farm prosperity now than for any other business because the government, realizing that agriculture is the basis of national wealth and prosperity has taken active steps to give aid to that industry. The farm board act makes it possible now for farmers to organize cooperatively, assured of adequate financing.

The End of the Wild Horses

A TRAINLOAD of "wild" horses left Bend last night. They were spoken of as wild horses. They had given the Wyoming riders who had escorted them from the range to the cars just as much trouble as if they had been. But they were not of wild stock; they were not even technically wild. Not a one of them but had the mark of someone's iron. They were private property which must be purchased before ever it might legally be removed from the range. They were not the glorious mustangs of fiction, descendants of the Arabs and Barb and conquistadores which had become a new type in the course of centuries. Nothing of the kind. These were tame horses gone wild. Many of them had felt the saddle and the harness; most of the others were but a generation or two removed from man's bondage.

So there was little of degeneracy in the band at the stockyards last night. Now and then there was a brown-tinted, hammer-headed, worthless nag—either the result of too close breeding, or of highly indeterminate cross-breeding. But more of them were a good grade of light draft horse, or an even better grade of saddle.

These, a few years ago, would have been well worth any man's money. Last night they were headed for the slaughter house to become fertilizer and meat for export to Europe, or to be turned into hamburger or into the canned food of which our city dogs are so fond. The age of the horse is past.

was the home of the sea lions and this cavern was entered for the first time by women or possibly for the first time for this two adventures, we do not know which. At any rate it was a real thrill and set the pace for those seeking thrills no matter how they may wish to get them.—North Bend Harbor.

If Julius J. Meier becomes governor we may be able to buy our auto licenses for $29.98.—Baker Democrat-Herald.

Talks on Health By DR. R. S. COPELAND

SKIN diseases are of many types. "Psoriasis," in some form, is the one which is most frequently met. It is a persistent, obstinate ailment, often resulting every effort at control.

A person may have it and otherwise appear to be in perfect health. It is probable, however, there is some underlying cause which is really a form of disability. It may be some fault in digestion, or in the blood, or in the glands of the skin.

The skin disturbance may appear in one patch or in several well-defined patches. There is a red background, and this is covered with the delicate, silvery scales or crusts. In children the crusts may form on the scalp, and when these are rubbed off there is bleeding.

Some authorities in skin diseases believe that kidney trouble or gout is present in the system and the skin disturbance is only a symptom.

In psoriasis or other chronic skin disorders it is to be suspected that the intestinal tract is out of order. Constipation forms one of the greatest foes to normal health. In its chronic form it produces degenerative changes in the system. The wastes of the body, not being properly eliminated, encourage the development of bacterial poisons. These are carried to every part of the body, including the skin. It is not to be wondered at then that skin diseases follow.

It is most important that the bowels be kept open, either by proper diet and exercise, or, failing that, by laxatives that are found to fit your own particular case and as prescribed by your doctor. Sometimes simple enemias taken at intervals will serve to keep the intestinal tract free from the waste which otherwise clogs it. But the important thing is that the waste products be carried away by proper kidney and intestinal action.

The intense itching accompanying skin diseases is greatly relieved by a sponge bath either boracic acid or bicarbonate of soda may be added.
