Poets' Corner

AROUND THE BEND
W. TAYLOR COOPER

In the early morning hours, while fresh and bright life's day, Kindred and companions travel with us on the way.

But one by one they leave us, the home folk and the friend, For the land that lies unseen, around the river bend.

How we miss those comrades who once journeyed by our side, Their words of cheer and counsel will ever with us abide.

And, too, we prize the new friends that now our way attend, They close the ranks left vacant by those gone round the bend.

Looking down the Stream of Time, we view its dimming shore, Till, fading round a headland, from thence 'tis seen no more. Toward that point our course is fixed, ever must it tend, Until we, too, are lost to view around the river bend.

Sometimes skies are cloudless, again, misty obscure the view. Hold the helm, good Pilot, that our course may be kept true, The river current's shifting; the signs on shore portend That 'twill not be long until we reach the river bend.

'Tis a goodly, pleasant land, that realm that lies unseen, Stream of event, waters flow 'mid fields of living green.

There, comrades gone before, await, at the journey's end, To greet us when we, too, have passed round the river bend.

PROGRESSION

By ALDEN HARNESSE
If the writer's little poem on progress was longer it would violate the artistic sense, so he is adding a few words in prose on the subject.

Back, far back in the dim and remote ages, long, long before the dawn of history, when the stone-age and flint-tipped spear were the only weapons primitive man, a tall, broad-shouldered, muscular fellow, named the great tropic forests of the younger world, hunted the enormous mammoth, and contended for supremacy with the great cave bear and the ferocious saber-tooth tiger.

When primitive man dug his first cave and used it for a dwelling, progress began and since then it has continued its often-contested march down through the centuries.

The great law which runs through all nature and governs the entire universe is the law of progression and this law is back of the destiny of all nations. Progress has ever grown in scope and volume. The vastness of its magnitude is now almost inconceivable.

The poem already mentioned, which has been published in the Reality Magazine, is as follows: When just one star existed; When just one sun shone warm; Far back in Time's beginning We took on human form.

From lowest depths we struggled, We fought through endless night, A million years rolled onward Before we gained the light.
