Matured, Nine-Inch Salmon in Tahkenitch Puzzling Culturists

State fish culturists are puzzled at the appearance of a run of peculiar salmon into Tahkenitch lake near Gardiner, Ore.

The strange salmon, said to be entering the lake from the sea in great numbers, are only nine inches in length, yet they are fully developed and the females contain ripe eggs.

Matt L. Ryckman, superintendent of hatcheries for the game commission, said he believed them to be silverides, but he could not explain their infant size.

"Each of the females," he said, "contains ripe eggs and the males also were found to be fully developed. They possess definitely forked tails as do the young of true salmon."

Residents of the vicinity, he said, sent several specimens to the state offices in Portland. They said the run was a common annual occurrence.
