

GRASSES SOUGHT FOR HOLDING SOIL

400 Foreign Varieties Eyed at Washington for Use in Conservation.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24 (AP)—Four hundred foreign grasses and other growths were examined by soil conservation officials on the trail of crops to tie down the soil and give it a "toe."

Under the proposed new farm program, soil conservation is the main basis for cash benefit payments to farmers cooperating with the government.

In addition to foreign growths, many native grasses were said to be included in the extensive investigations. They are tested for effectiveness in erosion control, suitability to different soil types, climate and cultural conditions, drought-resistance and handling characteristics.

Officials said the erosion control program, first of all, must allow the farmer to grow the crops he desires and do it with a minimum of interference.

Cover Crops Suggested

They suggested that for cover crops land used for cotton or corn be seeded in the fall to hairy, woolly, podded, or Monnanta vetch, Austrian winter peas, crimson clover, rye, oats and other such crops which can be grown singly or in mixture for soil improvement and grazing.

Various Crotalaria species, they said, make excellent growth before frost when planted in corn at the last cultivation. In the extreme southern portions of the cotton belt, velvet beans, beggarweed, soybeans, Kudzu, Sudan grass and pearl millet, in addition to Crotalaria and other crops, offer a wide variety of summer cover.

It was pointed out that in all farm areas there are many grasses and legumes adapted to permanent pasture use and which are readily established and easily maintained.

To Save Humus Layer

The first principle of the soil conservation program was explained as soil protection, means to save the humus-carrying top layer by retaining vegetative covering. Insofar as possible crops to "tie down the soil" should, as in the case of legumes, capture nitrogen from the atmosphere, and build up the chemical content of nitrates, phosphorus and potash.

The main idea behind a national soil conservation program, officials said, was to "keep the soil on the land where it belongs and save it for him who owns it." They estimated that about 100,000,000 acres which, if split up in 80-acre farms would support 1,250,000 rural families, have been lost through erosion.
