NEW GRASS TYPES
INTEREST GROWERS

Farmers of both eastern and western Oregon are becoming increasingly interested in the production of special pasture strains of grasses and clovers developed in recent years by experimental workers in England, Wales and New Zealand, says E. R. Jackman, extension agronomist at Oregon State college.

The development of these special strains came as a result of a study of the performance and adaptability of different strains of the same crop. It was found, for example, that the strain of timothy that gave the best yield of hay might be the least desirable strain as a pasture crop, and, on the other hand, a strain which spread out on the ground and gave continued high yields of pasture was worth little as a hay crop.

In developing these pasture crop strains of seed, the European workers chose pastures which had been so highly grazed for years that no plants had gone to seed. Heavy producing plants were picked from these pastures and new strains were developed particularly fitted for pasturing. In this manner pasture strains of orchard grass, English rye grass, white clover and timothy were produced. Some of these have developed the vegetative growth habit so strongly that they do not produce as much seed as the old strains. A small plot of the new strain of English rye grass was grown last year by Antoine Evers of Forest Grove.

Another crop which is beginning to attract attention as a pasture possibility is yellow trefoil, sometimes known as black medic, which grows wild over much of eastern Oregon and parts of western Oregon. This plant looks like alfalfa, but has formerly been regarded as a weed. Jackman reports, however, that he has recently received a number of letters from eastern and southern experiment stations inquiring about a source of seed of this plant. The Cornell experiment station is recommending it for use in pasture mixtures in the state of New York.
